The United States told North Korea yesterday that it would consider the Communist proposal for partitioning of the Panmunjom truce area if the safety of American troops within the joint security area was firmly guaranteed. Rear Adm. Park F. Fradden Jr. indicated that unless this demand was met, the Communist proposal would not receive serious attention. The American position was outlined at a meeting of the Military Armistice Commission at Panmunjom. It was the third such meeting since last week's slaying of two American officers by North Korean troops near the demilitarized zone. [Page 1, Column 5.]

QUOTATION OF THE DAY
"Order for my country and for all my peoples." —Gatawzi, Zulu tribal leader, decries violence in South Africa.

Terrorists in Iran killed three American employees of the Rockwell International, a United States concern doing work for the Iranian armed forces. The killers escaped. The United States Embassy said the men were killed in an early-morning ambush in Teheran and identified them as William C. Cottrell, 43 years old, Robert R. Krongard, 44, and Donald C. Smith, 43, all of California. They had been employed by Rockwell, the embassy said, "on a research project for the Government of Iran." Iranian officials said the killers were members of the same self-styled "Islamic Marxist" antigovernment terrorist group which was officially said to have been responsible for the assassination of two United States army colonels in Teheran last year. [1:6-7.]

Two giant United States Air Force Star-Lifter transport planes, both based at McGuire Air Force Base in New Jersey, crashed in separate accidents while trying to land in Britain and Greenland. At least 38 of the 44 persons aboard were killed. One of the planes was carrying a group of 17 Americans from New Jersey back to the United States air base at Mildenhall, England. All 17 were killed. The other plane was on a flight down the western coast of Greenland from Thule air base to Sondrestrom. It was carrying 27 Americans and Danes. [1:4.]

Chief Gatsaba Buthelesi, leader of South Africa's 4.8 million Zulus, accused the South African police of instigating the riots in which 21 blacks were killed in Soweto last week. He said the entire white population would be answerable for the sins that were committed against the blacks in their name. Chief Buthelesi made the statement at a news conference in Johannesburg after attempting to mediate between Zulus and black antigovernment demonstrators who were attacked by Zulus. The clashes broke out again yesterday, but the police said they were broken up without further casualties. [1:4-7.]

An unflattering picture of Prince Bernhard has been provided by the official report of the Dutch Government into allegations that he had accepted bribes from the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation. He is viewed as petulant, weak, indecisive and scheming. He wrote pained letters to Lockheed complaining that his efforts for the company were unappreciated. The report said he eagerly followed the advice of, and seemed to play a subordinate role to, Fred C. Meuser, a wartime friend and Swiss-based Lockheed official, who cemented Prince Bernhard's links to the company. The Prince, the consort of Queen Juliana, is said to have actively sought funds from Lockheed, having given the impression that he was open to bribes, and to have made it clear to the company that he could maneuver deals to its favor and rarely objected to gift offers from the company. Dissidents Get Jail Terms From 2 to 8 Years for Criticizing Government

By FOX BUTTERFIELD
Special to The New York Times

Seoul, Aug. 28 (AP)—Another trial two years ago and eventually sentenced to a suspended three-year jail term.

In many ways the four-month-long trial, which bore the marks of a show trial, represented a clash in values between South Korea's Western-educated and heavily Christian intelligentsia and the stern Confucian regime of Mr. Park, a former officer in the Japanese Imperial Army.

A three-judge panel of the Seoul District Criminal Court charged that the 18 defendants, all Christians, had "distorted the political situation by claiming there was no freedom in this country." The judges also said the defendants had "slandered the Constitution" and violated a sweeping 1975 presidential decree banning all forms of dissent, including criticism of the decree itself.

In a 75-minute statement announcing the verdicts the judges said: "We have been impressed by the academic credentials of the defendants." But, the judges added, "steeped in dogmatism and prejudice, they have brought harm to the country."

The charges grew out of a manifesto that the defendants issued at the Myeongdong Catholic Cathedral in Seoul last March. It demanded that Park should resign and revoke the repressive Constitution he proclaimed in 1972 as well as the presidential decree, known as Emergency Measure No. 9.

Cardinal Is Dismayed

Stephen Cardinal Kim, the leader of Korea's Catholic minority, said after hearing the verdicts read in the packed courtroom this morning: "This is a tragedy not only for the people involved but for the whole country." Five Catholic priests were imprisoned for terms ranging from two to five years.

Cardinal Kim added that the effect of the trial "may be to silence the people."

Defending the verdicts, the Deputy Minister of Culture and Information, Kim Dong Whie, said that the defendants constituted "a threat to national security."

"If we did not deal with them, it might spread to the whole country," he said, and might encourage aggression from North Korea.

The deputy minister spoke at a lavish luncheon organized by his ministry for American correspondents immediately after the trial ended. Mr. Kim insisted that actually the trial was "a very tiny, small matter."

"We are acting with prudence and restraint," he added.

Over the last two years, Yun was under the impact of a series of tough presidential emergency decrees, repeated arrests and carefully controlled trials, opposition to President Park from students, intellectuals, Christians and the small opposition political parties in the moribund National Assembly has dwindled. The collapse of South Vietnam last year and continued threats from North Korea have contributed to this process, making many Koreans more willing to acquiesce in Mr. Park's one-man rule.

Mr. Park himself, according to a presidential assistant, is now "much more confident than he was a year and a half ago when he worried about the dissidents; now he is a happy man."

In the face of all the obstacles against them, the 18 defendants at the trial appeared "unreasonably brave," as one American missionary who has been a regular spectator at the session in the old Japanese colonial brick courtroom put it.

While repeatedly denying that they sought to overthrow the Government, the defendants had tried to turn the trial into an indictment of President Park's 13-year-old rule.

They accused the President of destroying democracy, repressing freedoms, repressing the poor by keeping wages low, encouraging prostitution for foreign-exchange money and selling the country to Japanese business interests.

But with the public barred from the courtroom and the Government-controlled radio and press printing only the barest details of the proceedings, few Koreans have any idea of what went on inside.

At one point the lawyer for Mr. Kim—the former presidential candidate who was kidnapped by South Korean Central Intelligence agents in Japan in 1972 and brought back to Seoul—was detained himself.

Nevertheless, the defendants maintained an outward show of composure today. When they were being led away to a prison bus, its windows covered with canvas, Mr. Kim flashed a victory sign with his fingers. Many spectators burst into applause.

Mrs. Kim, who appeared at the reception in Mr. Yun's home, wore her husband's prison number sewn on her dress.

"This was merely a political trial, retaliation against us for trying to restore democracy," said Mrs. Kim, a small woman with glasses and an intense expression. "But the Korean people will not give up hope because of this."

After Clean-Up, Lake Baikal Is Again Open for Fishing

MOSCOW, Aug. 28 (Reuters)—Siberia's Lake Baikal, said to contain a fifth of the world's fresh water, is again open to omul fishing after a seven-year clean-up, the press news agency Tass has reported.

A 40-month test showed the lake's stocks of omul, a delicacy of the salmon family, has increased enough for catches to resume, Tass said.

Fishing for omul was stopped after it was found that sunken logs had covered fish-spawning grounds and were depleting oxygen in the lake.

Rivers running into the lake had been used to float logs to lakeside paper and pulp plants. Log-floating was banned in 1971 and the clean-up began.

Hanoi General Describes 'Trick' Used in Raid on Saigon Airport

SINGAPORE, Aug. 28 (Reuters) — Captured American-made fighter-bombers were used in a "trick" strike on Saigon's Tan Son Nhut Airport in the last days of the fighting for the city, according to the general who commanded the North Vietnamese forces.

Gen. Van Tien Dung gave the account in an issue of the English-language Vietnam Courier Monthly, published in Hanoi.

He said in a continuing that on April 25, 1975, publication of his memoirs a few days before Saigon fell. "We hit upon the idea of using enemy aircraft manned by our pilots to strike at Tan Son Nhut airport."

Three days later, five South Vietnamese H-37 planes manned by North Vietnamese pilots carried out the attack.

Strings of Bombs

"When our planes reached the sky above Tan Son Nhut, the bewildered enemy at the control tower radioed up to them: 'Hello H-37's from which air wing? Which air wing? Which air wing?'"

"U.S.-made aircraft" came the reply—followed by one, two and more strings of bombs dropped on the lines of enemy planes," the general said.

Czechs Assured on Prices

PRAGUE, Aug. 28 (Reuters) — President Gustav Husak pledged today that basic consumer prices would not be increased next year despite harvest setbacks.

He also reports that poor results in the potato and sugar-beet crops and a lag in the wheat crop would cause higher prices and shortages. "This is not true," he said.

Meanwhile, South Korean reporters covering the session said that they had seen a Chinese delegate appearing with the North Korean side for the first time since the recent crisis began. Observers here refused to speculate on whether his appearance indicated Chinese willingness to back up the North Koreans.

In Cairo, Arab World's 'Sin City,' a More Conservative Islamic Mood Is Apparent During Ramadan

Special to The New York Times
CAIRO, Aug. 26—The sheikhs could not find the thin crescent of the new moon in the sky over Egypt Wednesday night, however, it was discerned over Saudi Arabia, so sheik Mohammed Khater, the mufti of Egypt, ordered the firing of the cannon from the Citadel to signify the beginning of Ramadan.

For the pious among the 350-million Muslims of the world, the month-long fasting began from sunrise until sunset, they are forbidden to eat, drink, smoke or make love. The peasants in the fields under the desert sun go without water and the office workers in Cairo's huge bureaucracy forgo the oversweet tea that seems so necessary to their existence the rest of the year.

Ramadan, because it follows the lunar calendar, occurs in a different period of the Western calendar every year. This year's Ramadan will be particularly harsh, because temperatures are still over 100 during the daytime in much of the Arab world.

Very little work is done during Ramadan, because those who are fasting do not have the strength and those who are not use it as an excuse. Many offices open late in the morning and close shortly after noon.

Arab World's Sin City
 Cairo, with its bars, gambling casinos, night clubs and prostitutes, has a reputation as the sin city of the Arab world, at least now that Beirut has lost its allure in a civil war. Yet the fast of Ramadan is quite strictly observed here.

One of the many Lebanese now living in Cairo says he ordinarily does not observe the fast at home, but feels ashamed in Cairo if he does not. "I find myself ashamed of smoking a cigarette in the streets," he says. "But in Beirut, even though I am known there, I do it."

Indeed, many people perceive a stricter religious tone in Egypt than before. Like the sighting of the crescent that signifies Ramadan, Egypt may be taking its cue in this from Saudi Arabia and other strict Moslem countries.

"Egypt used to be a cosmopolitan city," said a distressed Egyptian-American on a trip back to his birthplace this week. "He noticed, he said, a more conservative religious tone than before, pointing to women with their heads covered in the establishments designated as tourist areas. The new law, although weakened from the original proposal that the sale of alcohol to Egyptians be totally banned, was the result of a strong movement in the People's Assembly toward Islamic law.

Proposals were debated in the Assembly that would have decreed a fine for anyone who publicly broke the fast. Another would have reinstated the Islamic penalty of cutting off the hands of thieves.

Despite this new conservatism, Cairo still has a festive air during Ramadan, with a night of enough eating and drinking to make up for the fast. At the sound of the cannon after sunset, the iftar, or fast begins. Those who cannot go out to visit with friends go to the Hussein Mosque, where there is a party throughout the night until the fast begins again.

3 U.S. CIVILIANS DIE IN IRANIAN AMBUSH

rorists opposed to the regime of Iran's ruler, Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi.

The killings, along with an undisclosed number of killings of Iranian police officials, are generally seen as part of a campaign to embarrass and undermine the Shah.

Today's ambush was the first known occasion that United States civilians employed her by an American company had been assassinated; therefore it spread particular concern through the United States community in Teheran, which is where most of the estimated 37,000 American citizens in Iran live.

Prominent Iranians and Americans in the Teheran business community believe that Rockwell employees had been selected for murder because of the company's involvement in Project Irbex, which is to cost more than $1 billion and to gather information on activities in neighboring countries.

The major role of the United States Government and of American companies in the huge Iranian military buildup in the last three years has attracted criticism in the United States and among dissident Iranians, here and abroad, who object to the Shah's rule. No public criticism of the Shah is tolerated in Iran, however.

Islamic Marxists Cited
Iranian officials have said that one dissident element in Iran was composed of "Islamic Marxists" combining Islamic extremism with left-wing political views. Before today the Iranian police were reported to have rounded up the terrorists involved in previous killings of Americans here.

At least 60 alleged terrorists are officially said to have been killed or executed in Iran this year. The actual death count is rumored to be substantially higher.

At least 10 clashes between security officials and alleged terrorists were reported during the first half of this year, and in some the alleged terrorists were killed. No such clashes were reported after today's killings.

Teheran business informants reported that today's three victims, who were all married, were employed by Rockwell on an unspecified contract with the Iranian Air Force, but it could not be determined that their work was connected with the $1 billion Project Irbex.

On Way to Work
According to business informants, the men were being driven to work by an Iranian chauffeur when the ambush took place, shortly before 7 A.M. on the eastern outskirts of the capital. They were employed at an Iranian Air Force headquarters building.

Their car, a late model Dodge Coronet, was cut off in front by a Volkswagen. Another vehicle cut off the Dodge from the rear and, by some accounts, four terrorists appeared. The terrorists were understood to have ordered the chauffeur to lie down and then to have started firing into the Dodge with submachine guns and pistols, killing all three Americans on the spot.

This pattern was similar to the one used in the May 19 killing of the colonels, which also occurred while they were on the way to work.

The Rockwell employees were understood to have used the same route to go to work on most days.

Iranian Police Guard
The United States Embassy here and other buildings considered likely targets for terrorists are routinely guarded by Iranian police. Security measures were stepped up today after the killing, and one Iranian guard outside a United States installation, referring to today's murders, said, "There has been much shooting."

The Embassy statement, which was not issued until the afternoon, reported that the Shah had expressed "sincere regrets" over the death of the Americans. But no details of Iranian police activity following the killings were disclosed, although the statement said: "The Government of Iran has assured the American Ambassador that every effort will be made to bring the terrorists responsible to justice."

Eleven alleged members of the Islamic Marxist group were tried last winter by Iranian military courts here for the murder of the two colonels and other acts of political violence. Nine of the accused were convicted and executed by firing squad on Jan. 24. The sentence of a 10th man was commuted to life imprisonment by the Shah, and one woman was sentenced to 15 years in prison.

Some boots (not these) were made for stepping daintily down fashionable avenues. And some (yes these!) were built for stomping, tromping and tramping. Out in the woods on an autumn day. Out in the darks and the storms of night.

Out where the call of the wild begins. Out where you want to be: full of fun and free.

There's no law, however, that says you can't sport these polished leather Big Boots in the city. (Sometimes that's where you need all the "brave" you can muster.) All these were designed and carefully crafted by the people who really know how to create real boots, Sandler of Boston.

Everything here is in the color everyone who's in-the-know wants right now: pale paratrooper tan. Just about as smooth and shiny as butterscotch toffy. It'll go beautifully with your Scotch plaid pants. And we don't have to tell you what else. Jeans, knickers, tucked-in tweeds for openers.

Now look at the soles. They're thick and sturdy. Look at the stitching. It's big and bold. Nothing "Oh, my, I'm shy" here. But then, you've never seen Mother Nature acting bashful, have you?

Take our tie-'em-up Klondike boots with cleated rubber soles, 45.00. Or choose the ankle-high Super boot with soft padding. Also with cleated rubber soles, at 26.00. Then there's the classic Western pull-on with strong leather sole and heel, 47.00.

But that's not all. We've got a whole new collection of Sandler Real Boots. Just stride on up to Young Colony® Shoes on six and say "Mother Nature sent me."

These tragic events will be impossible to get over."

The chief, whose position was weakened by the Government, spoke acridly of the remarks made by Prime Minister John Vorster at a rally of the governing National Party last night. Mr. Vorster told an audience in Springs, east of Johannesburg, that white South Africans had no reason to have a guilty conscience about anything.

The flippancy in which the Prime Minister and his Government have treated the whole tragedy seems to have created chasms between black and white which no concession can bridge, Chief Buthelezi said. By an official count, 290 people, all but three of them black, have died since the antigovernment rioting began two months ago.

Mr. Vorster, making his first public pronouncement on the upheaval in 10 weeks, acknowledged that South Africa has national and international problems. But it is not a crisis, he said.

There are those in South Africa every July or August who give out that we are facing a crisis, to suit their own purpose," he said, in what appeared to be a reference to the attacks on the Government by its parliamentary critics before the National Party's annual Congress, which is to be held in Worcester.

"Helping the Enemy"

The Prime Minister continued: "If there is a crisis, then all I can say is that in my lifetime I have seen bigger crises. Those people who want to shout wolf, wolf are doing South Africa an ill-service. They are playing right into the hands of the enemy."

"The enemy want to find us in a crisis, and they want us to admit that we have a guilty conscience. But looking over South Africa's achievements, I say we have no reason to have a guilty conscience about anything."

"I want to make it clear that nowhere in the world have four million done so much for the 18 million as in this despised South Africa," the Prime Minister said to loud cheering. The figures were those for the white minority and black majority populations of the country.

His advice to the white population was not to worry and not to compound the atmosphere of crisis by dwelling on it. "Stop it," he said. "Carry on with your work, and there will be less time to see a crisis."

He added: "I have not lost faith. It has become more clear to me that our people are able to overcome their problems. We have an inexorable calling here and our almighty has called us here to fulfill it. No one can doubt that."

It was the first time since the crisis began that a Government figure has invoked the Calvinistic sense of mission that Afrikaans have traditionally given in justification of their position here. From the earliest days in the 17th century, white settlers believed it to be a God-given duty to civilize the black man and give him tutelage.

Mr. Vorster's remarks came as the Government prepared for fresh talks with urban black leaders. The talks, opening on Monday, will cover black demands for the abandonment of apartheid. Mr. Vorster has already said that the essentials of the system of racial separation are not negotiable. His Government has announced some minor concessions, including expanded homebuying rights in black townships like Soweto.

Similar to Police Boots

Chief Buthelezi gave a lengthy chronology of what had occurred in the township, compiled from descriptions that he said had been given to him by the Zulus at the main hostel, where 1,600 migrant workers from KwaZulu live. He had addressed the workers outside the hostel yesterday.

He said the hostel residents had told him that several Zulus were killed by the demonstrators on their way to and from work in Johannesburg, some by being set alight and two others by being thrown off a train. He said the workers vowed vengeance but began by arming themselves and returning to the railway station, where they intended to protect other commuters.

He said they had done this for a while, but were joined by a group of more heavily armed men wearing red boots similar to those worn by the police. He said the newcomers passed out marijuana under the eyes of watching policeman, who did nothing to intervene.

Then some white policemen were alleged to have told this armed group of men to bulaka zonke (kill all), or words to that effect, Chief Buthelezi said. At this point some of the leaders, who were now in a rage and a frenzy of anger, moved into the residential areas of Soweto, where all kinds of plundering took place.

The chief said he had also been told that some of the hostel dwellers were transported to the scene of the disorders by the police and that three policemen, one of them black, subsequently visited the hostel to instruct the residents to doctor their accounts when talking to reporters. He said some residents complained of having rushed to the police for protection only to be told that they should taste their black power.

wheat and rice fields, cork and eucalyptus groves, is located here in the southernmost part of Alentejo Province. The province has been the center of Portugal's chaotic agrarian reform program, begun after the revolution of April 25, 1974. The Government has begun cautiously to restore lands that had been illegally occupied before they were expropriated, but it is not an easy process and has been marked with violence.

Workers aided by the Communist Party had seized most of the large landholdings in the Alentejo and vowed to defend the land with their lives. They have resisted owners' attempts to recover it.

Most Seizures Recognized
Presented with a fait accompli, the Ministry of Agriculture has recognized most of the takeovers, or some 2.5 million acres of land. Under pressure from the Portuguese Confederation of Farmers, however, the ministry last March set up a Complaints Bureau and pledged to correct any "abuses or excess."

A total of 1,200 complaints have been made so far, but very few are justified, according to Joaquim Castro Guerra, the Secretary of State for Agrarian Reform. He said that the ministry had ordered the return of 50,000 acres, or only about 2 percent of the total occupied land. This was generally made up of small holdings that did not come under the agrarian reform law. He conceded that some of this land had not yet been turned over to the old owners because of "resistance" by the workers. "Nobody else in the Odemira area has managed to get any land back, although there have been orders to hand some back," Mr. dos Santos, the tenant farmer, said as he recounted his own victory over what he described as "the Communist farmworkers' union."

The owner of the Cuba Estate was Dr. Vitor Leite Serrão Marreiros, a judge in the Lisbon military court. But Mr. dos Santos, as his tenant farmer, actually won the property for the last 10 years, paying an annual rent of $5,868. Mr. dos Santos managed to buy a 150-acre farm for his family. After the revolution, Mr. dos Santos quickly adapted to the agrarian reform law of July 1975, which stipulated that landowners could not hold properties of more than 1,750 acres or 50,000 points, a classification based on type of soil, crop and equipment. Mr. dos Santos gave high-point irrigated land of Upper Cuba to his farmhands and kept for himself 825 acres of timberland as well as a small area of rich ricefields. Even with his own farm he was still under the 50,000 points.

Occupiers Want All
Last Nov. 20 the agrarian reform commission approved the occupation of Upper Cuba but, according to Mr. dos Santos, the occupiers said that they had an order to take over all of the estate. The tenant farmer took his case to the farmers' confederation, the agrarian reform commission, the district governor and up to the Ministry of Agriculture. Finally in April he won an order for restoration of his land. The workers, however, mobilized 300 armed comrades to prevent his takeover, whereupon the authorities cracked down, sending a helicopter, six armored cars, 80 horses, jeeps, trucks, and 500 members of the National Republican Guard. The Cuba Estate has been quiet since then.

French Cabinet Holds First Meeting

By FLORA LEWIS
Special to The New York Times
PARIS, Aug. 28—President Valery Giscard d'Estaing told the newly-formed French Cabinet at its first meeting today that it must behave "as a team" and press for reforms with "conviction and ardor."

But the executive committee of the Gaullist party, on which the new Government must rely for its parliamentary majority, issued a stern warning. A communique said it would judge the new Government "by its policies and its results."

Specifically, it promised to support the Government "insofar as it acts vigorously against inflation and maintains the line of national independence and real social progress."

Reserving Judgement
Except for the undertones of "national independence," which Gaullists use to describe the foreign policy of Charles de Gaulle, these are policies which Mr. Giscard d'Estaing has promised. But the implication was that the party is reserving judgement. Its communique approved both the decision of the Gaullist former Prime Minister, Jacques Chirac, to resign, and of the nine Gaullists who have accepted posts in the new Government.

"While some party members have accepted responsibilities in the Government, we no longer have responsibility for the Government," the statement added somberly.

This is the first time since the founding of the Fifth Republic in 1958 that neither the President nor the Prime Minister is a Gaullist.

At the Cabinet meeting, the President stressed that the Government's work would be conducted under his own authority, although he promised that his decisions would not be conveyed directly to the ministers but through his new Prime Minister, Raymond Barre.

Respected Economist
That conceded one of the lesser demands that Mr. Chirac had made for greater authority. When the President refused it, Mr. Chirac resigned, bringing down the Government.

Prime Minister Barre, a respected economist who has served on the Common Market Commission, has been well received by the public as a competent, non-partisan figure. But the main theme of French comment on the Government shift was that it marks full "Presidentialization" of the regime, in the word of a former Prime Minister, Rene Pleven.

The most urgent problem for the Government, and Mr. Barre's special task, is on the economic rather than the political front. He said he would study the situation next week and begin meetings with the "social partners"—labor and management—the following week.

2 AIR FORCE JETS CRASH, KILLING 38

were survivors from the Greenland crash but they did not know how many.

A Danish liaison officer at the Sondrestrom air base said 21 of the 19 passengers and 8 crew on board the StarLifter in Greenland died. Danish sources said the passengers included three children.

The liaison officer said seven persons were rescued from the crash, but one of them died later in a hospital.

Greenland radio said the StarLifter appeared to stall during landing at Sondrestrom, fell tail first on the runway and exploded.

Lt. Col. John P. Richmond, spokesman for McGuire Air Force Base, said, "The circumstances of these accidents are entirely different and it is believed there is no connection between them."

Both the British Defense Ministry and the Pentagon said there were no survivors among the four passengers and crew of 13 in the other StarLifter crash. It came down in a field beside a major highway as it approached Milledenham for a landing.

Names Withheld

The names of victims in both crashes were withheld pending notification of relatives.

A witness to the crash near Peterborough, England, said the plane may have been struck by lightning.

A storm was sweeping the area near Peterborough, 80 miles north of London, as the StarLifter approached Milledenham.

The witness, David Taylor, aged 53, said he believed the aircraft was hit by lightning at about 2,000 feet.

"It came down very slowly covered in flames. It seemed to come apart in the air. When it hit the ground there was quite an explosion, which I assume was the petrol tanks bursting," he said.

U.N. Reports Slavery Exists In Africa and Latin America

GENEVA, Aug. 28 (UPI)—Slavery is still widespread in Latin America and Africa, according to a United Nations report.

The report, drawn up by the Working Group on Slavery of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, said children of the Ache Indians of Paraguay were selling for the equivalent of $2.

Forced labor exists in Equatorial Guinea and "the virtual enslavement of many peasants for agricultural labor" prevails in four Central American countries, the report, issued on Wednesday, said.

The countries were named as El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Nicaragua.

Dutch Report Depicts Bernhard as Petulant, Weak, Indecisive and Scher bribes, made it clear to the company that he could maneuver deals to their advantage in the Netherlands and rarely objected to gift offers from the company.

"He showed himself open to dishonorable requests and offers," the report says.

The Prince himself has a $300,000-a-year salary. Queen Juliana receives a tax free allowance of $1.3 million and has a private fortune estimated at $12 million.

Although the inquiry strongly criticized the Prince and said that he acted in "a completely unacceptable manner," the three-man panel concluded that there was no firm evidence that he received the $1.1 million alleged by Lockheed to have been paid to him.

Because the inquiry failed to find any proof of the allegations, the Dutch Government decided against setting up a criminal investigation of the Prince's conduct. The inquiry, however, cited several examples in which the Prince is said to have accepted money from Lockheed and to have sought favors.

Although the report provides a vivid portrait of Prince Bernhard, it also sheds light on an intriguing, hitherto little-known figure who was said to have been middleman in the alleged payoff of more than $1.1 million by Lockheed to the Prince in the early 1960's. The alleged bribe was designed to solidify Lockheed's links in the Netherlands and to spur the purchase of the company's Starfighter jets.

The little-known figure, who died in 1968, was Col. A. E. Pantchoulidzew, Prince Bernhard was said to have treated him as a virtual father. The Prince's own father died in 1934. Colonel Pantchoulidzew, a naturalized Dutchman of White Russian origin, had known and stayed with Prince Bernhard's parents since the early 1920's. He was close friend of the Prince's mother, Princess Arrgard.

It was, according to the report, a complex deal. A Dutch friend of Mr. Meuser's named Hubert Weisbrod was enlisted to serve as a go-between. The report quotes a Lockheed official as telling the company of a conversation with the Prince in which it was agreed that the money should be paid through Mr. Weisbrod to Mr. Pantchoulidzew.

The official said that "Mr. Pantchoulidzew would contact him Mr. Weisbrod in the Hotel Doldar in Zurich on Oct. 3, 1960, to give instructions into which the sum of money transferred through Mr. Weisbrod were to be paid."

According to the commission, "Col. Pantchoulidzew presented himself at the agreed time and place. He handed over a slip of paper bearing his name and the number of a bank account."

According to the Lockheed account, the money was transferred as arranged — $300,000 in October 1960, $380,000 in 1961 and $400,000 in 1962 and paid into Mr. Pantchoulidzew's account with Mr. Weisbrod's cooperation.

Prince Bernhard strongly denied receiving the $1 million except for $100,000 paid out to "mutual acquaintances." Confronted with the name of Mr. Pantchoulidzew, the Prince said this was "a complete surprise to him and incomprehensible," he reported says.

The commission itself rejected the Prince's version, backed by Mr. Meuser, that the money was intended for Mr. Meuser to satisfy grievances he had against Lockheed.

"The commission does not regard it as likely that Mr. Pantchoulidzew would have been prepared to comply with the request to act as an intermediary if he had not believed that he would thus be serving H.R.H.'s interest or acting in accordance with H.R.H.'s intentions."

Theories About $1 Million

Exactly what happened to the $1 million that Lockheed apparently sent for Prince Bernhard's use remains unclear. There are two theories in The Hague: The money was used in the transaction, or the funds could be in Prince Bernhard's personal accounts under an assumed name.

Perhaps the most remarkable section of the report covers late 1974, when the Prince is said to have written to Lockheed asking for a commission on Dutch Government purchases of Orion anti-submarine aircraft.

The specific request for the commission — as well as other requests to Lockheed — were apparently made after Mr. Meuser's repeated urgings. Mr. Meuser himself was the figure who initially brought Lockheed officials and Prince Bernhard together.

Prince Bernhard was said to have asked for commissions that would have amounted to $4 million to $5 million, but then reduced his demand to $1 million. The Prince was reportedly angry, however, that Lockheed seemed cool to the idea.

On Nov. 3, 1974, he wrote a letter to R. B. Smith, a former Lockheed vice president then associated with a Paris law firm. The letter—which was issued in the inquiry's Dutch transcript but not the English one—reads as follows:

"My Dear Mr. Smith. The message you gave my secretary by phone and your confirmation in writing was, to say the least, disappointing as you can imagine. It occurs incredible to me that this proposal would be rejected like this without dialogue and discussing details for other possibilities.

"This would never have occurred in the days of Bob or Courtlandt Gross former senior officials.

"Since 1968 I have in good faith spent a lot of time and effort to push things the right way in critical areas and times and have tried to prevent wrong decisions influenced by political considerations.

"I have done this based on my old friendship with Lockheed—and based on its past actions.

"So I do feel a little bitter. Any proposal can be modified—but at this point also in view of diplomatic pressure put on—by someone, you'll guess who—I feel that I will not do any more about this procurement program. What's more I will say so when consulted."

The commission the letter "appear an impression" forwarded to headquarters at Calif. Mr. Smith proposes to print a formula involving of a fixed commission million if at least craft were procured.

Reporter's Slaying Sharpens Focus on Arizona Crime

By ROBERT LINDSEY
Special to The New York Times

PHOENIX, Aug. 26—Almost three months after a car bomb fatally injured a Phoenix investigative reporter, Don Bolles, the motive for his assassination is still uncertain and the police have not yet arrested anyone for ordering his death.

But repercussions of the slaying and the public outcry that followed it are continuing to send ripples through Arizona, particularly by focusing attention on one of the reporter's favorite targets — so-called "white-collar crime" involving businessmen.

Among other recent developments, a newly appointed county prosecutor here and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have revived an inquiry into possible improprieties surrounding a $6 million loan made in 1972 by Arizona's largest bank, Valley National Bank, to C. Arnold Smith, a San Diego financier and friend of former President Richard M. Nixon.

The new prosecutor said he was particularly puzzled over why two of the bank's legal representatives had been given key jobs in the Treasury Department during the Nixon Administration at a time when the bank was making questionable loans to a major contributor to Mr. Nixon.

"I've seen enough in this office in two weeks to scare the hell out of me," said Donald M. Harris, who was appointed Maricopa County prosecutor this month following the abrupt resignation of Moise Berger as prosecutor.

In "Best Families" crime and the Mafia, but what I've seen are crooks who belong to the country club, who are from prestigious old-line law firms, from the best families who helped found this state, from people who work at banks," he said in an interview. "I've got a feeling that there's a web that controls things — politicians, lawyers, bankers, wealthy people who move in the best circles."

"We have a substrata of dirty criminals who use guns to rob people," Mr. Harris continued, "and we have a higher strata of guys who wear Brooks Brothers suits and button-down shirts, and in the middle we're getting squeezed by both sides." Mr. Bolles had written extensively of business crime for The Arizona Republic, died June 13, 11 days after his car was blown up by a dynamite bomb at a downtown hotel, where he had been lured by an informant's promise of a news tip.

John H. Adamson, a 32-year-old racing-dog owner, is scheduled to stand trial for murder beginning Oct. 1. At a preliminary hearing, a close friend of Mr. Adamson alleged that the dog owner had confided to him that he was to be paid $10,000 by unidentified people to kill the reporter. Mr. Adamson has pleaded not guilty to the murder charge.

Theory on Planning
From the outset, the police have contended that the slaying was planned by a group, probably including people with important political connections. Investigators say they have strong suspicions of who at least some participants in the planning of the killing were. But their failure to make further arrests suggests they have been unable to develop evidence strong enough to hold up in court. Their present strategy appears to be to hope that additional evidence will come out during Mr. Adamson's trial. And, if Mr. Adamson is convicted, it is hoped he will provide information about the crime in exchange for a lighter sentence. "We're looking at some other people," Jon Sellers, a detective who has been on the case since the bombing, said. "But we don't expect any arrests before the trial; we're trying to get Adamson first, and then we'll turn to the other people."

The police have questioned a wealthy contractor who conceded that he agreed to help finance Mr. Adamson's legal defense and also a close friend of the contractor, a rancher who was one of Arizona's wealthiest men and lost an important state appointment as a result of Mr. Bolles's reporting.

The Motive
The police have theories on a number of possible motives — revenge, an effort to silence Mr. Bolles on subjects ranging from dog racing to land fraud to the possibility that friends of a person harmed by his reporting were attempting to avenge him.

Although the reporter mentioned the word "Mafia" moments after the blast, the authorities have generally discounted the Mafia involvement. One detective said, "It just doesn't seem to be their style to kill a reporter." Mr. Bolles also said "Emprise," a Buffalo company that dominates dog racing here and is said to have ties to organized crime.

In direct and indirect ways, another investigation has helped the authorities uncover a number of other possible crimes. "I can't tell you what they are, but it has already let us into a number of areas that weren't obvious before," said William Schafer 24, an Assistant Attorney General, who was named special prosecutor for the Bolles case. The state Attorney General's office is known to be looking into the acquisition and development of the large Lake Havasu City development by the McCulloch Oil Corporation more than a decade ago. Other investigators are checking into possible conflicts of interest connected with the $2 billion Central Arizona Project, a federally sponsored plan to bring Colorado River water to this area and turn virtually worthless desert into land suitable for residential and agricultural development.

For 5-Month Term

Mr. Harris was appointed county prosecutor to fill the five-month unexpired term of Mr. Berger, who had long been under fire and resigned after a number of his assistants threatened to quit unless he did. Their action came after The New York Times published excerpts of a tape-recorded conversation in which a senior prosecutor's office attributed lack of vigor in prosecuting land fraud to pressure from a powerful "coalition" of leaders dominated by a local Republican Party figure.

Mr. Harris, a 38-year-old Brooklyn native who served as a Marine captain in Vietnam, said he did not want the prosecutor's job after the current term. He said he had ordered his staff to undertake investigations into a number of areas that he said had been largely disregarded by the office in the past — land fraud, securities and bank fraud, illegal political contributions and others. He said he had turned over to the F.B.I. information developed by his office regarding the defaulted $6 million loan to Mr. Smith, the California financier. Valley National Bank is a major economic force in Arizona, with assets of $3.7 billion. One of its directors is Robert Goldwater, a brother of Republican Senator Barry Goldwater. Bank officials have said that earlier investigations had found no crimes committed by bank officers. Mr. Harris said he could not understand why no one at the bank had ever been prosecuted in a case where the bank had clearly violated its own regulations in making loans. "Did some of that money end up as political contributions to Nixon?" he asked. "I'd like to know. I'd also like to know why two lawyers who came out of Phoenix, Ariz., lawyers who handle the Valley National Bank, a federally chartered bank, were suddenly appointed to high posts in the Treasury Department." "Why Phoenix? Why these two guys," he asked. One of the lawyers he referred to was Edward Morgan, who served both in the White House and as an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. He was later convicted of falsifying income tax documents for Mr. Nixon.

Debts Worrying Idled Rubber Workers As Unexpectedly Long Strike Nears End

Randy T. Cox and his family outside their home in Akron, Ohio. Mr. Cox is employed by the B. F. Goodrich Company, which is still shut down because of a strike. He charges that the company has not bargained in good faith with his union.

By REGINALD STUART
Special to The New York Times

AKRON, Ohio, Aug. 28—When the 60,000 members of the United Rubber Workers union struck the nation's major tire and rubber makers, most people here expected to see an enthusiastic strike of four to six weeks, then back to work.

But it has been more than four months since the strike began. Most of the enthusiasm has died. And the faces of those returning to work and those still on strike are weary; pockets have been wearing thinner. "I'm in debt up to my neck, you know," said Oble L. Williams, a 44-year-old stockroom worker for the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company. "I'm just glad I had good credit."

A Goodyear employee for 24 years, Mr. Williams, who voted to strike in April, was accustomed to bringing home several hundred dollars a week for his wife, Anna, 39, and their four teen-aged children, three of whom are in high school. His union strike fund benefits have not totaled more than $130 a week during the strike, now in its 130th day. That's about par for most of the workers with families.

"When I went on strike, I had a week and two days' pay in the hole," said Mr. Williams. "I didn't save up a lot because I didn't think it would last more than four to six weeks. So I've had to borrow $500 here and $500 here to pay the bills, right now the strike was a mous as far as I'm concerned. I've lost, I figure, between $8,500 and $10,000 because in the summer, vacation time, I'd work overtime a lot, 12 hours a day."

To make ends meet, Anna Williams sought an additional work, the family went on Federal food stamps in June and their creditors, although used to shorter strikes in the past, have eased their normal payment terms.

The rubber workers union reached a tentative agreement with the target company of the strike, the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, on Aug. 12. Ratification of the agreement is conducted separately with each of the four major tire manufacturers. The workers at Goodyear settled on Aug. 23 and those at Firestone settled on Aug. 25. Employees at the two other companies, the B. F. Goodrich Company and Uniroyal Inc., have not ratified the pact.

Although Mr. Williams can see the resumption of his regular income, most of it is already spoken for by creditors and his children. "Usually we'd have all the kids' clothes for school bought by now, before Labor Day, you know," he said. "We don't have any of them now." While most union members working for Goodyear were quietly celebrating their decision to accept a new contract calling for a wage increase

1,000 Protest In Louisville

LOUISVILLE (AP)—About 1,000 demonstrators in downtown Louisville protested the court-ordered desegregation of the city's public schools. Organizers said that up to 1,000 people would take part in the demonstration.

Bob DePrez, the march's organizer, said that he was disappointed that the march did not draw more people. "It's going to get up," Mr. DePrez said. The small march was made up of masses of protesters who were wearing jackets with the United Klans of America emblem and waving Confederate battle flags while shouting anti-Semitic slogans. Public Safety officers had not been called in because of the small size of the march since last year.

Oil Pipeline 76 Percent

ANCHORAGE—The cost of the 800-mile pipeline to Alaska is announced at $7.7 billion, 76.1 percent of the total cost. The Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. disclosed in a report that the pipeline was well advanced. The 800-mile pipeline is still to be completed by the end of the year. The 76.1 percent is based on a cost of $10.1 billion for the project.

State Troop Detroit

DETROIT—More than 1,000 Detroit State Troop members cruised Detroit freeways to help the city's crime prevention program. The city's crime prevention program is a joint effort of the city and the State Troop. The city's crime prevention program is a joint effort of the city and the State Troop.

Protest of Phillips

BETHESDA (AP)—Three Phillips Petroleum Co. workers protested the company's decision to close its plant in Bethesda, Md. The workers said that the company's decision to close the plant was a result of the company's decision to close the plant.

Working By Strike

WASHINGTON (AP)—Worldwide strikes during the month of August have cost the economy more than $1 billion. The strikes have cost the economy more than $1 billion.

The return to work for both men and women will be welcomed. But they both also voiced another concern that worries them just as much as the strike has already. If the companies stick to their guns, some jobs will be eliminated or moved. And they could be among the first to be eliminated.

RIGHTIST TERROR STIRS ARGENTINA

Demands Grow for Action to End Wave of Violence

By JUAN DE ONIS
Special to The New York Times

BUENOS AIRES, Aug. 27—Bombings and kidnappings attributed to right-wing extremists in Argentina have increased public demands for effective measures by the military authorities to control this form of political terrorism.

The military junta headed by Lieut. Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, Commander in Chief of the army, has been unable to control the right-wing extremists, who are clearly linked to the military and the police, despite the declared goal of the junta to exercise a monopoly of violence.

The extent of the abductions and the execution of persons who presumably were in custody of the authorities, has raised concern to new heights among groups that repudiate the left-wing guerrilla activities but who are concerned over the rise of right-wing extremism and violations of human rights.

A group of prominent political and church figures, calling themselves the Permanent Assembly for Human Rights, issued a document this week that for the first time publicly called on General Videla and other members of the junta—Adm. Emilio Massera, the navy commander, and Brig. Orlando Agosti, the air force commander—to use the force that is inherent in the responsibility of maintaining order and security to end all forms of political violence.

Two Mass Killings

A week ago, 47 persons were executed in two mass killings as a reprisal for the assassination by left-wing guerrillas of Gen. Omar Acia, a retired army general who was in charge of organizing the 1973 World Football Cup to be held in Argentina.

General Videla ordered an investigation, and Government sources said that a military officer had been identified as being responsible for the execution of 30 persons being held for subversive activities. Some unspecified and unannounced disciplinary measures have been taken, the source said.

Among those killed in the mass execution at Pilar were members of the left-wing Peronist Montonero guerrillas who had been arrested for attempting to kill General Videla in March, the source said. Others had been responsible for assassinating a police inspector.

The lack of any public announcement was attributed to a military decision to withhold information about anti-subversive operations that could damage the morale of security forces.

Contradictory Reports

For the past 10 days, the Ministry of the Interior has reportedly been searching for former Senator Hipolito Solari Trigo and former Deputy Mario Abel Amaya, both of the center-left Peoples Radical Party, who were abducted by armed men in Trelew, Chubut Province.

An informed Government source said the two men had been found in the custody of a security group, although the Ministry of Interior and military authorities had earlier denied any knowledge of their whereabouts. There was no official confirmation of the report that they had been located.

A writ of habeas corpus was presented in Federal court Wednesday by the mother of Marcelo Ariel Gelman, 20 years old, and Eva Gelman, 19, children of Juan Gelman, an Argentine poet who has been living in Rome. The two youths had been abducted, along with the pregnant wife of young Gelman, from the family home by armed men.

Two dynamite blasts early yesterday caused material damage, but no injuries, at two synagogues in the predominantly Jewish neighborhood of Villa Crespo in the capital. Another bomb was defused outside the offices of the morning newspaper La Opinion, which has given prominent display to articles condemning earlier attacks on Jewish businesses and calling on the Government to ban publications of anti-Semitic tracts being distributed by pro-Nazi groups.

Wednesday night, a bomb destroyed the automobile of Hector M. Corbacho, the newly appointed dean of the faculty of architecture and urbanism of the University of Buenos Aires.

This is the second bombing at the university since Alberto Costantini, a conservative but outspokenly antisemitic rector, was appointed by General Videla. The rector's position in favor of academic freedom in the university has been attacked by right-wing ideologues in the Ministry of Education.

Government in Peru Stepping Up Its Efforts to Halt Subversion and Increase Production

Aug. 28 (AP)—Government of Peru stepped up efforts to curb activity, inflation and stimulation it began.

state of emergency. Soldiers entered Lima at 5 A.M. curfew of four million people was violated. At least 40 people were killed and 200 injured.

public meetings have been employed for the first time in a year.

According to the Interior Ministry, extremists and terrorists are being investigated inside and outside the Government. Sources close to the Government say that Communist influence is ebbing.

When thousands of miners threatened to close copper mines recently, the military arrested 40 strike leaders and the walkout ended.

Then police removed radical university students from the National Engineering University. Hundreds were arrested under Government emergency provisions. The students largely protested the moderate trend in the revolutionary Government of Gen. Francisco Morales Bermudez, who became President in a bloodless coup within the military last Aug. 28.

In major speeches, admirals and generals claim that extremists are trying to foment discontent over a series of "economic shock" measures implemented in July to ease inflation and a balance-of-payments deficit.

The President said last week that violent counterrevolution would be averted in Peru because the nation needed calm to step up production. The trend toward detaining fervent revolutionaries began earlier this year when officials rejected Communist-oriented policies espoused by the regime of Gen. Juan Velasco Alvarado, who ruled from 1968 until he was ousted in last year's coup.

General Morales Bermudez has purged leftist officers, the latest being Prime Minister Jorg Fernandez Maldonado, who was retired in July.

Marxists Arrested

But the purge has also extended throughout official circles. The Interior Ministry states security officials are investigating all extremists. In the last several months, scores of members of the Marxist underground group, the Vanguardia Revolucionaria, have been rounded up.

Writers, columnists and editors suspected of being against the Government have been fired from Government-controlled newspapers.

VOTING SURPRISE BY FORD FORECAST

New Campaign Chief Says President Could Even Score Coup in South

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

VAIL, Colo., Aug. 28—President Ford may "surprise a lot of people" in the Nov. 2 election and could even score a significant coup in the South against Jimmy Carter, the President's campaign director said today.

As the President prepared to break camp in his Rocky Mountain retreat here and return tomorrow to Washington, James A. Baker 3d, the new chairman of the President Ford Committee, said that "people are selling us short" in the contest with the Democratic nominee.

Mr. Baker told reporters at a briefing on the political strategy Mr. Ford devised here this week that the President was in "very, very good shape" in a dozen or more states, his campaign would be "aggressive" but not "dirty" and the South would not be written off as lost to the former Governor of Georgia.

Mr. Baker's optimism was not atypical in an election contest with two months to go, but it reflected an evidently widespread attitude among Mr. Ford's campaign aides that the odds against the election of the Republican President were not insurmountable.

'Ford Is Ready'

"Ford is ready," said one of the key participants in the nine days of tactical deliberations the President conducted here. "He wants to go out now and find Carter and take him on."

Another senior political adviser said that Mr. Ford had expressed both bravado and impatience during a discussion of possible ground rules for televised debates with his Democratic rival, asking: "Why do we need these time limits? Why don't we just go until one of us drops?"

The Gallup Poll issued last Wednesday indicated that the large, 23 percentage point lead Mr. Carter enjoyed before the Republican National Convention had shrunk to 10 percent after the nomination of Mr. Ford and his running mate, Senator Robert Dole of Kansas.

More significant than the nationwide figures—49 percent for Mr. Carter, 39 percent for Mr. Ford and 12 percent undecided—was a regional analysis suggesting that Mr. Carter's edge eroded rapidly outside the South, Mr. Baker contended.

Points to Key States

He said that Texas, New York, California and Illinois were examples of "key" states where Mr. Ford and Mr. Dole would campaign energetically. He added that the President's organization was conducting private polls in 18 states, including Virginia and Mississippi in the South, to gauge the opportunities for upsets.

"We hear constantly now that things in the South are completely different than what they were two weeks ago," the campaign chairman said. Mr. Baker confirmed that the Ford campaign had budgeted $10 million, nearly half of the $21.8 million allocated to each major party ticket for the federally financed campaign, for advertising because it would "reach the largest number of people in the most efficient way."

He did not dispute, but would not confirm, reports from other associates of Mr. Ford's that the President would concentrate on building an electoral base in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Illinois, which have a combined total of 129 of the 270 electoral votes needed to win.

Train Tour Perhaps

He acknowledged consideration of a whistle-stop train tour by the President.

Mr. Baker, who was appointed Wednesday to succeed Rogers C. B. Morton as campaign chairman, expressed confidence there would be a minimum of "this pull and tug that we have seen" previously between the White House and the campaign organization.

He said that Richard B. Cheney, the White House chief of staff, would sit with seven campaign officers as an executive committee that would make the strategic decisions in consultation with Mr. Ford.

Mr. Cheney and Stuart Spencer, the political director, left Vail this afternoon for California to seek an understanding with aides to Ronald Reagan on the role Mr. Ford's defeated Republican rival will play.

Mr. Baker appeared optimistic about enlisting Mr. Reagan. He said that Mike Curb, the new Republican National Committee member from California and a Reagan associate, had slipped quietly in and out of Vail to discuss the campaign.

Mr. Dole departed today for Washington to resume his preparations for the campaign. The President is scheduled to return to the White House tomorrow after stopping at Yellowstone National Park in Wyoming, where he was a park ranger 40 years ago, and at an Air Force base outside Rapid City, S. D.

Dole's I.T.T. Role Could Be Fall Target

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 28—Robert J. Dole, the junior Senator from Kansas and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, survived the political devastation of the Watergate and L.T.T. affairs apparently unscathed.

But the records of the two investigations leave several questions about Mr. Dole's role unanswered and potential ground for political rhetoric in the next two months.

Mr. Dole became chairman of the Republican committee in January 1971. Four and a half months later the I.T.T.-Sherrill Corporation offered the Republicans a $400,000 "guarantee" ostensibly as part of an effort to attract the 1972 Republican National Convention to San Diego, where the corporation was building a hotel.

At the same time, the Department of Justice was considering whether to ask the conglomerate to divest itself of several of its major, profitable holdings. John N. Mitchell, then President Nixon's key political adviser, was Attorney General.

I.T.T.'s offer was made public in late February 1972 by the columnist Jack Anderson in the publication of the "Dita Beard memo," which suggested that the money was to induce the Nixon Administration to press the Justice Department to make a decision favorable to the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation.

Hearings Reopened

At that time, the Senate Judiciary Committee was considering the nomination of Richard Kleindienst to succeed Mr. Mitchell. It reopened its hearings to investigate the L.T.T. matter. Mr. Dole was not called as a witness, although he was chairman of the committee to which the I.T.T. offer was made.

Ed Reinecke, then California Lieutenant Governor, received the I.T.T. offer early in May and transmitted it by telephone to Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Reinecke was later tried and convicted of perjury because he lied to the Senate committee about telling Mr. Mitchell. The conviction was overturned on the ground that no quorum was present in the committee when he gave the testimony.

Mr. Reinecke later told a grand jury here that alone with Mr. Mitchell he was sure he had informed Mr. Dole and Daniel Evans, Mr. Dole's assistant, about the offer. Josephine L. Good, one of Senator Dole's assistants at the Republican committee, testified that she gave Mr. Dole a memorandum on July 2, 1971, that completely outlined I.T.T.'s offer, and she said it was "conceivable" that he could have given a copy to Mr. Mitchell.

Was Not Asked

Had Mr. Dole been a party to informing Mr. Mitchell of the offer, he might have been aware that there was an attempt to manipulate the Justice Department's I.T.T. case. He was never asked these questions by an official body.

Senator Dole has made several speeches on the matter in news conferences, on March 10, 1972, he acknowledged that the party had received the offer but denied it had any connection with the antitrust case. He said he had rebuffed an effort by Mrs. Beard, a consultant for I.T.T., to meet with him in 1971. In 1974, when he was running for re-election, however, The Kansas City Times quoted him as saying he never knew about the offer.

A check of present and former Senate Judiciary Committee staff members who worked on the I.T.T. investigation found that there was no clear reason why he was not called to testify.

One staff man suggested privately that the thrust of the investigation centered mainly on I.T.T.'s relations with Mr. Nixon's White House and the staff believed that Mr. Dole and the party committee were "on the periphery" of what was going on in Washington.

Reinstated as Chairman Senator Dole fell out of favor with the Nixon White House late in 1972 and was asked to step down. He was replaced by George Bush, now the Director of Central Intelligence.

During the Senate Watergate hearings in the summer of 1973, it was disclosed that while Mr. Dole was at the Republican committee he received $3,000 from the same secret cache of money that later financed the Watergate burglary.

Hugh Sloan, the treasurer of the Committee for the Re-election of the President, testified that he gave $3,000 to Senator Dole for a trip to South Vietnam.

"Internally within the staff we could not understand why we were saying for Mr. Dole's trip," he testified.

Committee investigators, however, found a memorandum from Bart Porter to Jeb Stuart Magruder, both elections committee officials, that more fully explained the transaction.

The memo noted that Senator Dole had been selected by President Nixon as a spokesman for the Administration's Vietnam policy in the summer of 1971. It was thought that to enhance his credentials he should make a trip to South Vietnam. The memorandum noted that Senator J. W. Fulbright, Democrat of Arkansas, then the severest critic of the War, had never been to Vietnam. Mr. Fulbright was chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The memo estimated the trip

would cost $2,000 or so and that Mr. Dole had rejected payment for it with either Republican committee funds or through a Senate committee. If it was paid for with party funds, the memo said, Mr. Dole would be criticized for playing politics; if Senate funds were used he could be criticized for misappropriation of Government money.

The memo suggested that the re-election committee would secretly supply the funds and that if Senator Dole was asked, he would reply, "a private source supplied his travel funds." He apparently chose to do that.

On Aug. 1, 1972, the Congressional Quarterly routinely published Mr. Dole's report of his 1971 travels. The report noted: "Aug. 17-22, Japan, South Vietnam, Cambodia, Thai-an enthusiastic Democratic audience:

"If Mr. Ford can get away with this list of issues and be elected on it, I'm going to call the dictator of Uganda, Mr. Amin, and tell him to start giving speeches on airport safety."

Rescue in Uganda

Idi Amin is President of Uganda, and it was at the airport at Entebbe, Uganda, that Israeli commandos recently rescued hostages who had been passengers on a plane hijacked by terrorists.

Mr. Mondale ended his talk here by saying of himself and Mr. Carter: "We're delighted with Mr. Ford's selection of the issues. We hope he'll stay on the campaign trail, and it'll be the biggest victory we ever had."

After his appearance in this Chicago suburb, Mr. Mondale flew to Dayton, Ohio, where he took up the same theme at a picnic of the American Federation of Federal, State, County and Municipal Employees.

"In the two years since Gerald Ford came into office," Senator Mondale said, "2.5 million Americans have been added to the unemployment rolls. It's the Republican mismanagement of the economy that put these people on the unemployment rolls."

Agreeing with the President that the nation needs an accelerated home ownership program, he said: "The Nixon-Ford Administration has deliberately and systematically gutted the major housing programs enacted by Democratic Congresses, which have caused runaway inflation and high interest rates, have severely crippled the construction industry."

"If these are the real issues in this election," he said in Dayton, "and I could not agree more with Mr. Ford on that, then the reason they are the issues is that the Ford Administration and the Republicans' eight-year record of economic mismanagement have made them so."

Home of Home Runs CHICAGO (UPI)—A total of 125 homers were hit at Wrigley Field, home of the Chicago Cubs, in 1975. It was the highest number in any ballpark in the National League that year. The Cubs managed to hit only 54 of them.

Dole Samples Life as a Runnin

By DOUGLAS E. KNEELAND
Special to The New York Times

VAIL, Colo., Aug. 28—The long campaign trail to November began to unwind this week in front of Senator Robert J. Dole.

And even before he came to this mountain retreat to get his first real marching orders from the President and Mr. Ford's political advisers, the 53-year-old Kansas Republican, who flew back to Washington today, had had a few samples of what life is like for a Vice-Presidential candidate.

In Seattle, for instance, he got to wear his American Legion cap from Russell, Kan., Post 89 as he compared the aging legionnaires assembled in national convention there with the heroes of Athens while quoting Pericles as having said that "happiness depends on being free, and freedom depends on being courageous."

He also got to tell a lot of self-effacing stories to some hastily-put-together Republican gatherings. ("I haven't determined yet how I was selected by President Ford. Somebody told me he flipped a coin and it didn't come down.")

Running Mate's Lot

Vice-Presidential candidates have to say things like that, because their main task is to praise the Presidential candidate.

Then, at the Iowa State Fair in Des Moines, he got to hear Lawrence Welk and his orchestra and thrill to the sight of a 40-horse hitch as a breathless announcer declared, "he's backing them up, ladies and gentlemen, 98,000 pounds of horseflesh—for those of you who have trouble backing out of the garage."

After speaking at the fair the next day, in a series of happenings carefully arranged by his advance men, Mr. Dole also got to pose in front of a big, blue Ford tractor, pet a prize sheep in a red, white and blue blanket, pose for pictures with the little girl in a red, white and blue Uncle Sam costume who owned it, shake hands with a monkey in a red, white and blue jacket and eat a bratwurst sandwich at a stand operated by the Des Moines German-American Club.

None of these things, of course, gave much of a clue as to what kind of Vice-Presidential candidate Mr. Dole will be—except that he endured them. But from his speeches, his informal talks before smaller groups and his news conference, a somewhat better portrait of Bob Dole, the campaigner, emerged.

An entertaining off-the-cuff speaker with the sense of timing of a practiced stand-up comedian, he seemed ill at ease with prepared texts, frequently stumbling over lines or emphasizing the wrong words.

In news conferences, although he had to acknowledge from time to time that he had not been briefed enough, he demonstrated, as he did in unprepared speeches, some of the easy humor and caustic wit for which he has been celebrated in Washington, both as a Senator and the former Republican national chairman.

He tells audiences frequently of his days as a young Congressman when he was always sent to campaign in "safe Republican or safe Democrat districts," recalling an Indiana radio announcer who, in summing up Mr. Dole's career, once said: "Prior to World War II, he was a very medical student. He suffered a serious head injury in the war and then he went into politics."

After warming up a crowd with jokes for four or five minutes at a Republican breakfast in Seattle, Mr. Dole looked out over them. "I'm very glad to be here. This is a very serious business—and we'll get on with it as soon as they tell me what it is."

Reputation as Fighter Senator Dole has a reputation as a rough-tounged political fighter, and most speculation following his choice as the Vice-Presidential candidate predicted that he would take the low road during the campaign, allowing Mr. Ford to maintain an above-the-battle Presidential stance.

However, while he trailed Jimmy Carter to both Seattle and Des Moines this week, and took sharp issue with the Democratic Presidential nominee's announced plan to pardon draft evaders, and questioned his assurances that a Carter Administration would be unlikely to impose embargoes on foreign grain sales, Mr. Dole did not show much inclination on his first road trip to go for the jugular.

Ford-Carter Race Found About Even Outside the South

President Ford's popularity after the Republican National Convention has risen to the point that he and Jimmy Carter, the Democratic Presidential candidate, are virtually tied outside of the South, according to the latest Gallup Poll.

cent of the vote to the President's 43 percent if the election were held at this time.

Nationwide, including the South, Mr. Ford would get 31 percent to Mr. Carter's 49 percent, with 12 percent either undecided or favoring other candidates, according to the poll, for which the total sample was 1,106.

In early August, just before the Republican National Convention, Mr. Carter led Mr. Ford 57 to 32 percent, with 11 percent undecided or supporting other candidates. And in late July, immediately after the Democratic National Convention, Mr. Carter's lead was even greater, 62 to 29 percent.

Past surveys have shown that a candidate's popularity increases significantly after the convention at which he is nominated.

The most recent survey indicated, however, that Mr. Ford had not made significant inroads into Mr. Carter's strength in the South, even though Ronald Reagan, who had considerable popularity in the South, threw his support to the President at the Republican convention. Mr. Carter holds the lead in the South 64 to 28 percent.

This was the question asked in the survey: "If the Presidential election were being held today, which candidate would you vote for—Ford, the Republican, or Carter, the Democrat?"

G. Maddox, a segregationist former Governor of Georgia, on a platform pledging income tax repeal, isolationism and the virtual elimination of the Federal bureaucracy. The party, which was the main ballot-line vehicle of Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace's presidential candidacy in 1968, had flirted this year with the idea of a high-priced promotion of some better-known conservative from the right wing of the Republican Party. In the end, however, the small band of American Independent Party veterans preferred to reclaim control of what they know will be only a fringe movement and a nuisance to the Democratic and Republican nominees this fall. Conservative exiles from the Republican Party who had hoped to reshape the American Independent Party and sell it hard as an alternative to the Republicans, left angrily today after Mr. Maddox's nomination foiled them last night. "This party has turned inward, backward, and downward," said William A. Rusher, publisher of The National Review and proponent of what he calls the New Majority Party. "They've written themselves off," he said of the American Independent Party. Party Was Angry But the party's leaders who rejected Mr. Rusher's takeover were equally angry that he had failed to deliver them a national celebrity, or at least an elected official, as their candidate. Months ago Mr. Rusher had led American Party officers to believe that Ronald Reagan might lead their ticket if they finally produced was a man. California Governor lost the Republican nomination. Until two weeks ago, Mr. Rusher held out the hope of enlisting such people as Sen. Jesse A. Helms of North Carolina, a Republican; Phyllis Schlafly, the antifeminist crusader; or Ellen McCormack, who ran an anti-abortion campaign in the Democratic Presidential primaries this spring. None of those figures apparently welcomed either the long odds against third party candidates or the extremist tinge of the American Independent Party. The candidate that Mr. Rusher finally produced was a man few people in or out of the party had ever heard of—Robert Morris of Plano, Tex., who described himself as a former New York City judge, newspaper columnist and currently unemployed university president. Richard A. Viguerie, the direct-mail entrepreneur who raised much of Mr. Wallace's treasury in this year's Democratic primaries, sought to run for Vice President on Mr. Morris's ticket and promised to raise a big budget for the campaign. Ultimate Approach But William K. Shearer, of California, the party chairman who seemed to have working control of the 339 "delegates" between them, Mr. Viguerie said, decided finally that he wanted more to run a low-budget campaign for a party he could call his own.

Mr. Viguerie commented that the party had consigned itself to being a "perpetual fringe group." He said he was "shocked and disillusioned" that the party would nominate a man who still calls himself a segregationist, as Mr. Maddox does. Mr. Maddox and Mr. Wallace, with whom Mr. Viguerie allied himself earlier this year, both came to power as militant opponents of racial integration in the 1960's. The difference between them, Mr. Viguerie said, was that "George Wallace was that 'George Wallace' type who changed; Lester Maddox has not changed."

Mr. Shearer said that the "right-wing conservative Republicans" like Mr. Rusher, a "supereducated, highly affluent country-club" constituency "And you lay them end to end and you can't beat an asthmatic turtle across a tennis court," Mr. Shearer said. "You cannot go that route. You can't operate, but they do not have the base."

Proposals Are on Ballots in at Least 6 States

By GLADWIN HILL
Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, Aug. 28—Legal problems are plaguing both proponents and opponents of proposals on atomic-power restrictions that will be on the ballots of as many as six states in November.

In Arizona and Ohio, advocates of the proposals are targets of lawsuits seeking to invalidate them. In Montana, defenders of nuclear power have gone to court to try to upset a law that prevents their campaigning against any restrictions.

In three other states, Colorado, Oregon and Washington, public debate about proposed restrictions is getting underway without, so far, any legal maneuvers, a New York Times survey showed this week.

The proposals in all the states resemble a measure rejected by California voters in their June primary, after the Legislature had enacted some less stringent restrictions.

The proposals, couched as initiative propositions, a form of direct citizen legislation, call for bans on construction of atomic power plants until state legislatures are satisfied that they will operate safely, that there are adequate facilities nationally for radioactive waste disposal and that the public will be fully compensated for damages from any accident. The last provision conflicts with a Federal law limiting company liability to $560 million in any accident.

Through Petitions

Initiatives get on ballot through petitions signed by registered voters, the number of voters varying among the 21 states with the initiative process.

Arizonans For Safe Energy filed about 79,000 signatures against a requirement of 55,250. However, opponents of the proposal, after a computerized audit, alleged that 35 percent of the signatures did not match up with the roster of registered voters. The Maricopa County Superior Court in Phoenix is scheduled to hear arguments in the case Monday.

In Ohio, the requirement is 307,000 signatures, and petitioners filed 370,000. However, Secretary of State Ted Brown ruled yesterday that there was a deficiency of 21,032 valid signatures. Under the law, the initiative proponents, Ohioans for Utility Reforms, have an additional 10 days to make up the deficiency.

Meanwhile, a suit is before the Ohio Supreme Court to invalidate the initiative on the ground that the petitioning process had been improperly conducted.

The atomic-power restrictions were only one of four proposed state constitutional amendments that citizens endorsed in signing a single petition.

Other Goals

cial "lifeline" utility rates for elderly people, regular consumer "ombudsman" representation at utility hearings financed by utility-bill surcharges, and amendment of the state's initiative process to ease the high signature requirement.

Utility companies, labor organizations and others opposing the nuclear restrictions, organized as Citizens for Safe, Lower-Cost Electricity, have brought a mandamus action against the secretary of state to keep the initiative off the ballot, contending that this packaging of diverse proposals is illegal.

In Montana, the power industry and allied interests found themselves hamstrung in opposing the nuclear restriction initiative by a 1975 election law forbidding corporations from participating in initiative campaigns.

Sixteen industrial and agricultural organizations, including utilities, banks, cattlemen and sheep raisers, are asking the Federal District Court in Billings to invalidate this law as an unconstitutional infringement of free speech.

Limit on Funds

A similar issue arose in the California initiative battle in the form of a state law imposing a $1.25 million limit on expenditures by either side in an initiative fight. This restriction was ruled invalid after the United States Supreme Court held that certain expenditure limitations in the new Federal election laws limited free speech.

Ironically, Montana has no atomic power plants and none planned there. But the utility industry is concerned about not having the option restricted.

The Arizona initiative, if approved by voters, would impede construction of the projected $2.8 billion Palo Verde nuclear plant 43 miles west of Phoenix, sponsored by the Arizona Public Service Company.

The Ohio measure would obstruct three projected plants, the Oregon measure one plant, and the Washington measure four proposed plants, apart from three already under construction.

None of the pending initiatives contains one of the most contentious provisions of the original California proposal, a requirement that until the various safety considerations could be assured, existing nuclear plants would have to curtail generation progressively, until they were out of operation.

New York Rated as Low Priority to Ford Campaign

By FRANK LYNN
New York, which is traditionally Democratic in Presidential elections, is clearly a low priority state for President Ford, despite the protestations of the President and Vice President Rockefeller on Friday that no state is being written off by the Ford campaign.

The words are contradicted by some clear signals from the Ford camp. Two top Ford campaign aides have told reporters that they have "very slim hopes" for New York and that the Ford campaign will be "won or lost" in the industrial states between New Jersey and Illinois.

Richard M. Rosenbaum, the Republican state chairman, got the same impression and, as he put it, "raised hell about this." "Even if you thought it was written off," he said, "it would be utterly idiotic to say so." He added that he had been "authorized by the President to say that this is a target state."

However, Mr. Rosenbaum's role in the campaign is viewed as another signal of the low priority given to New York. Mr. Rosenbaum and other state Republicans had expected that he would be offered either the Republican national chairmanship or the directorship of the Ford campaign.

Instead, the state chairman, who was a highly visible and effective Ford partisan at the Republican National Convention, was designated the Ford campaign chairman for New York and a member of a 26-member national steering committee for the campaign. "He's anathema to the Reagan people," said a close observer of the Ford campaign operation.

Mr. Rosenbaum has been closely identified with Vice President Rockefeller, another bogeyman for conservatives. He forcefully argued with the President against the position of some Reagan supporters that Mr. Ford should throw open the Vice Presidential nomination — a move that would have led to an effort to draft Mr. Reagan. "I'll have to admit to you that thought has crossed my mind," he responded.

Senator Walter F. Mondale, the Democratic Vice-Presidential nominee, told New York Democrats last week that he would be doing most of the "heavy lifting" for the Carter-Mondale ticket in New York and that Jimmy Carter would appear in the state only sparingly.

The Presidential candidate is scheduled to appear at a $5,000-a-couple voter registration fund-raising event Tuesday evening at the home of Arthur Krim. But he resisted the pleas of local Democrats to extend his stay to speak at the state A.F.L.-C.I.O. convention and at the Syracuse State Fair. Democrats hope to raise $500,000 at the Krim event.

William F. Buckley backing Aillard K. Lowenstein? It's true. The patron saint of conservatism last week endorsed Mr. Lowenstein, who is at least perceived, not necessarily accurately, as one of the most liberal politicians in the country.

Mr. Lowenstein is running in Nassau County for the House of Representatives against Representative John W. Wyder, the senior Republican in the New York delegation and a House protégé of President Ford.

Mr. Buckley praised Mr. Lowenstein as "among the two or three most able and conscientious Democrats running for national office." He said he was a politician with "extraordinary integrity and sense of justice." "It makes sense here and there," Mr. Buckley said, "to back judiciously an outstanding Democratic figure who is unafraid to resist the wider impulses of some members of his own party."

The Democratic Congressional primary in Brooklyn's 15th Congressional District is of more than routine interest to Meade H. Esposito, the Brooklyn Democratic leader.

The incumbent, Representative Leo C. Zeferetti, is the last Brooklyn Representative with close ties to the Democratic organization. Four other Democratic Representatives—Shirley Chisholm, Elizabeth Holtzman, James E. Scheuer and Stephen Solarz—fought the organization to win their seats. And a fifth, Frederick Richmond, started out as an anti-organization Democrat and won organization backing only when his nomination seemed inevitable.

In the Bronx there is a similar testament to the fading strength of the Democratic organization. Only one of four Democratic Congressmen—Representative Mario Biaggi—is closely identified with the Democratic organization.

PRAISE IS LEGACY OF THE CONVENTION

Democratic Delegates Hall New York City on Effort to Make Them Welcome

BY EDWARD RANZAL

New York City in July—hospitable, beautiful and exciting. That was virtually the unanimous opinion of 100 delegates to the Democratic National Convention in Madison Square Garden who took the time afterward to write Mayor Beame from all over the United States and from as far away as Hawaii.

Minoru Hirabara, head of the Hawaiian delegation, wrote: "New York is not like any other place in the world. I believe New York can still lead this country into an age of urban greatness—and I hope you will be given the chance."

Letters from Governors, Senators, Representatives and delegates had nothing but high praise for courteous police officers and taxi drivers and some extolled the honesty of the cabbies.

Honesty Is Cited

Chester Jones, administrative assistant to the Mayor of Lake Charles, La., wrote:

"I was impressed with a display of honesty. Upon catching a cab from the Plaza Hotel to Queens, I left my attache case and my camera in the cab. I had no idea who the cab driver was or the cab company. But, to my astonishment, the cab driver returned my things to me."

"I must admit I was very surprised at this act. It was really unbelievable that such a thing would happen in such a large city as New York. I am enclosing a certificate making the cab driver an honorary citizen of Lake Charles, also a key to the city."

In a handwritten note to Mayor Beame, Jimmy Carter, the Democratic Presidential nominee, said: "I was really proud of you and of New York. The hospitality and friendship were superb. Everyone was thankful that our convention was held in the greatest of all cities."

One delegate proclaimed: "Your city was fantastic. You can bet I'll be back." Annette Strauss of Dallas, sister of Robert Strauss, the Democratic National Chairman, wrote that she had "spent of the most beautiful and exciting days of my life and I want to thank you for the most hospitable reception."

Yankee Hospitality

Jeanne Edmunds, a member of the Carter Texas staff, added: "I was really treated to some fine Yankee hospitality."

The picture of New York as a cool, hard city was dispelled in some cases. For instance, Senator Thomas F. Eagleton of Missouri, said: "I must confess that when New York was designated as the convention site, I felt a tinge of apprehension. My mind conjured up visions of surly taxi drivers, various ripoffs and muggings and a strike of some public employee union or other. New York did itself and the Democratic Party proud."

Many writers were taken by the courteous, sometime humorous services offered by police officers. And Rocky Pomerance, Chief of Police at Miami Beach, wrote: "As a Police Chief, I am prouder than ever of my profession, having watched Commissioner Mike Codd and his men protect and service the needs of thousands of attendees during that exciting week in July."

Corrinne R. Whitehead, a delegate from Benton, Ky., said, "A young policeman saved the day for me." She said that she had broken her shoe heel when it got caught in a Madison Square Garden escalator step. "I was desperate that I would be forced to go on the convention floor either barefooted Kentucky-style or hopping. A policeman at the door, Anthony Picano, saved the day. He repaired the heel."

Patrick A. Sweeney, assistant majority floor leader in Ohio's House of Representatives, said, "It seemed to me that everyone gave that little extra effort that makes New York stand out above all other American cities."

"I feel especially qualified to speak on the subject," he wrote. "On my second day in your city, I caught someone breaking into my car. I was able to detain the man until we were able to call the police. Police Officers Jim Reid and Allen Ryan of Precinct 13 responded in minutes. They were absolutely outstanding in every respect. As public contact for your city, they could not be better. As men of law enforcement, they were efficient, effective and totally professional."

The secretaries in Mayor Beame's office, who handle the mail, said they had received at least 100 such letters. They could not recall one letter of complaint.

Plea Entered in Chess Case

CLEVELAND, Aug. 28 (UPI)—Ashby Leach, the decorated Vietnam veteran who held 10 persons hostage at gunpoint for nine hours Thursday on the 36th floor of the Chessie Railroad system tower, pleaded not guilty today to charges of kidnapping, extortion and felonious assault before Judge James Mulcahy in Cleveland Municipal Court. Bond was set at $450,000. Mr. Leach, 30 years old, of Huntington, W. Va., was expected to face a psychiatric examination.

"Well, Ezra, they say we're Stuffy so lets move the 'stuff' out at more than 1/3-1/2 off to make way for an even better Abercrombie & Fitch."

Yes, $2,000,000 worth of inventory just has to go, this week, so that we can carry out our plans to make "the-world's greatest sporting goods store" even greater. SHUTDOWN FACED BY 11 HOSPITALS

A Full or Partial Closing Is Weighed by New York State Agency to Control Costs

BY EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

Eleven voluntary and proprietary hospitals have been notified by the State Health Department that the agency was considering closing them entirely or in part in an effort to control costs by eliminating unneeded beds.

This became known yesterday as the department prepared for a public hearing on the problems of hospital costs and excess beds that it is to hold starting at 10:30 A.M. tomorrow at the World Trade Center.

Six of the hospitals that have been notified of their possible elimination or reduction are in Brooklyn, three in Manhattan and two in Queens.

In the letters sent to the 11 hospitals, the State Health Commissioner, Robert P. Whelan, noted that their institutions had less than 70 percent of their beds in use and that there was an excess of beds in the city generally.

Besides being able to testify at tomorrow's hearing, the 11 hospitals will have individual hearings before formal action is taken to withdraw their operating certificates, it was said yesterday by Associate Commissioner J. Warren Toff, who is in charge of the Health Department's New York City office.

The Six Brooklyn Hospitals

The six hospitals in Brooklyn whose futures are now endangered are Bay Ridge, which has 74 beds; Leferts General, 180 beds; House of St. Giles, the Criglo, 30 beds; Lutheran, 129 beds; Midwood, 56 beds, and Samaritan, 59 beds.

The three Manhattan hospitals notified were the French and Polyclinic Medical School and Health Center, 574 beds; Trafalgar, 145 beds, and the Medical Arts Center, 125 beds.

The two Queens hospitals involved are Kew Gardens General, 135 beds, and Parsons, 145 beds.

In addition to these 11 hospitals, Union Hospital in the Bronx was informed that its obstetric service might be closed, and Terrace Heights Hospital in Queens was told its obstetric and pediatric services might be shut down.

Last May, the Health Services Agency, a federally financed unit designed to control Government funds for health service in the city, had proposed that 30 voluntary and proprietary hospitals be closed. The 11 plus the two notified of contemplated service reductions have a total of 1,685 beds.

Early this year Commissioner Whelan had told the Legislature that 2,700 beds should be eliminated from the city's total of about 35,000 hospital beds. Because of the city's fiscal crisis, the Health and Hospitals Corporation has since shut down several hundred beds in the municipal hospitals.

CULTURAL CENTER FOR PUEBLOS OPENED

Special to The New York Times

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M., Aug. 26—The $2.3 million Indian Pueblo Cultural Center, designated by the leaders of the 19 pueblos in northern New Mexico as a showcase for their heritage and traditional arts and crafts, was dedicated and officially opened here today.

"There are other centers and museums with sections devoted to our pueblo history and culture, but our new center, which is entirely devoted to our history and heritage, tells our story in the manner that we would like to have it communicated to the non-Indian," Delfin Lovato, chairman of the All-Indian Pueblo Council, declared at a ceremony attended by tribal leaders from throughout the country and by prominent Federal and state officials.

The two-story structure, which is built in the crescent shape of the ancient Anasazi pueblos, houses facilities for a variety of services, educational and cultural programs, including conference rooms, exhibit halls, restaurant, arts and crafts market, library, printing plant, radio station and a 200-seat theater.

The center, which is expected to be a tourist attraction, will benefit the Indians through its Indian-controlled market of quality arts and crafts.

Financial support for the project came from auction conducted by pueblo craftsmen, contributions from businessmen and a $1.6 million grant from the Federal Economic Development Administration.

Black and White Coalition Urges N.A.A.C.P. Board to Settle Feud With

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

A coalition of prominent Americans, blacks and whites, has urged the board of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to settle without "additional public debate" its smoldering and potentially destructive feud with the organization's long-time director, Roy Wilkins.

The 14-member coalition includes Senator Robert H. Humphrey, Democrat of Minnesota; Mayor Thomas Bradley of Los Angeles; Mayor Richard G. Hatcher of Gary, Ind.; former Attorney General Ramsey Clark and Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, the psychologist.

The request was one of several recent moves by many people, at several different levels and both inside and outside the organization, that are aimed at helping the N.A.A.C.P. to overcome three crises that are threatening to destroy the stature, effectiveness and the very existence of the 67-year-old civil rights group.

In addition to the Wilkins-Board feud, the financially pressed organization must raise $1.5 million in 30 days to fight a $1.2 million court judgment in Mississippi. It must also agree soon on a replacement for Mr. Wilkins.

The dispute with Mr. Wilkins centers on the board's contention that the 74-year-old official must retire at the end of this year. Mr. Wilkins maintains that he end the board had agreed, in writing, that he would retire at the end of July 1977 after the association's annual convention at St. Louis, his birthplace.

A feud, that now and then has broken into the news media, has resulted from the disagreement and neither side has given any indication of backing down. The national membership has been split on this issue, and while it wants a strong, decisive board, it does not want to see Mr. Wilkins abused in any way, one board source has said.

Matter of Months
Asserting that it was not judging the "facts or the merits" involved in the dispute, the coalition said in a letter to the 64-member board: "We are compelled by our respect for Roy Wilkins and our deep concern for the continued integrity and stability of the association to write this letter in the hope that it will be helpful."

"No reasonable person can believe that the matter of a few months' difference as to when Mr. Wilkins turns over the actual leadership of the N.A.A.C.P. to a successor—whether it should be January or July of 1977—can take priority over respect for the contributions of this man and the imperative to maintain a positive, solid and dignified image of the N.A.A.C.P."

The letter urged that Mr. Wilkins should serve as "an active participant in the search and selection of his successor." Mr. Wilkins, who has served as the association's executive director for 22 years, is not involved in the search for his successor. In fact, some association sources have said, the board has recently taken away his right to hire and dismiss staff personnel.

The other signers of the letter sent last week to the board were Morris Abram, a lawyer; Mrs. Ralph J. Bunche; Mamie Phipps Clark, psychologist; Ralph Ellison, novelist; Dr. John Hope Franklin, historian; the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, former chairman of the Civil Rights Commission, Leontyne Price, the singer; J. Saunders Redding, historian, and the Rev. Leon H. Sullivan, chairman of Opportunity Industrialization Centers.

Interviews Begun
The search committee is made up of members of the national board is headed by the association's president, Dr. Montague Cobb. The committee on Friday interviewed several black men in Washington who are being considered for executive director.

Among those being considered are Benjamin L. Hooks, a member of the Federal Communications Commission; Gustav Hensingburg, director of the Newark Urban Coalition, and State Senator Julian Bond of Georgia. Association officials under consideration include the Rev. Charles Smith, a board member from Huntington, W. Va.; Clarence M. Mitchell Jr., chief lobbyist in Washington for the association; Gloster Current, the organization's director of programs, Nathaniel Jones, its legal counsel, and the board chairman, Margaret Bush Wilson.

Because of the importance of the post—the association's director would probably emerge as a spokesman for much of black America—there have been many attempts by a variety of special interests to influence the final decision.

Influential association members are watching the secret selection process as well as the Wilkins controversy, and several have discussed the possibility of calling a "constitutional convention" to bring the membership into the matter.

The search committee is attempting to come up with a shortened list for a board meeting in New York on Sept. 13.

This meeting will also have to determine how much of the $1.5 million that must be raised will be in hand and how much more will have to be solicited. The fund-raising campaign was prompted by a recent court judgment that granted $1.2 million to merchants in the town of Port Gibson, Miss., in a lawsuit filed last year. The suit, which was settled last week, was filed by a group of 40 merchants who claimed that the N.A.A.C.P. had received a special grant from the Federal Government to help them in their business.

1776 Brooklyn Battle Is Fought Again

ed out over the pageant that was watched by several thousand people.

There were Highlanders in kilts from Maryland, mountain men in dusky green from New Hampshire, gray-uniformed infantrymen from New York and grenadiers from Ohio.

But the crowd-pleasers seemed to be the redcoats, with their swords and leather straps and gold trim and white breeches.

For some of the participants, the choice of opting for the British or American side seemed to be decided by their own heritage.

There was Peter Lowell Ford, a descendant of the Lowells of Massachusetts, he said, who was intensely proud of his uniform of a corporal in the Welch Fusiliers.

Uniform Replicas

An insurance underwriter from Hempstead, L.I., Mr. Ford, as well as other members of the regiments, had fashioned their uniforms themselves after originals owned by the regiment, which is still active in the British Army.

"Everybody wants to be an American," Mr. Ford said, "but if you're going to do it historically right you have to have another side."

Jude Davidson, a student at Dundalk Community College, outside Baltimore, also chose the British side.

The Scottish name of his forbears, Mr. Davidson said, was MacDhal.

"I don't know if any of them fought for the British,"

he said, "but I've always loved everything Scottish."

Nevis Brown, a postal inspector from Ardsley, N.Y., said he could have chosen either the British or the American side, since one ancestor at the time of the Revolution was a tax collector for the Crown and another an American patriot.

For many of the participants, the Bicentennial pageantry was only part of their Revolutionary War hobby.

'Year-Round Work'

"It's not something you do a couple of weekends a year," said Major Pieper, a high school history teacher from West Canton, Ohio. "If you're going to have authentic uniforms and the right military procedures, it involves year-round work and study."

As it was 200 years ago, the British far outnumbered the Americans.

In the battle of Long Island, sometimes called the Battle of Brooklyn, the Americans suffered 970 killed and wounded, with 1,079 taken prisoner. The American losses amounted to about a fourth of Washington's entire command.

Of the British officers, five were killed and 21 were wounded or missing. Fifty-eight enlisted men were killed and 316 were wounded or missing. All told, the British had a force of about 15,000 men, compared with 9,000 for the American rebels.

The battle was a British victory, but historians note that the American loss had some redeeming aspects, including a tactical withdrawal.

And the British, it has been noted, failed to follow up the victory and underestimated the ensuing resistance.

As the battle re-creation was under way yesterday, about a hundred men and women dressed in Colonial civilian garb set up field kitchens and displayed 18th-century crafts.

The men and women, members of the Brigade of the American Revolution, offered examples of candle-dipping and wool-spinning and dyeing. They cooked several dishes, including apple pies, over open wood fires.

Esther Galinat of Coventry, Conn., said, "We are concerned not so much in the military operations, but in preserving the 18th-century crafts as a heritage."

After the battle, a number of other events were scheduled, including concerts of rock, jazz and country-western music, and, in the evening, a fireworks display.

Sudanese Says Nimeiry Executed 232 in Secret

KUWAIT, Aug. 28 (Reuters) — A former Sudanese Minister of Health has been quoted as accusing President Gaafar al-Nimeiry of having executed over 300 people in the aftermath of last month's abortive coup in Sudan.

Ahmed Zein al-Abbein said in an interview with the Kuwait newspaper Al-Rai al-Aam that 232 people had been secretly executed for their part in the uprising in addition to 98 officially reported to have been executed in connection with the coup.

Rights Unit Offers Legal Aid on New Law

By PETER KHSS
The New York Civil Liberties Union announced yesterday that it would be willing to provide legal aid to anyone who answered "no"—even if that answer was a lie—when asked about any arrest record on an application in this state for employment, insurance, credit or a license.

The civil liberties group said a new state law that goes into effect Wednesday prohibits employers, insurers and creditors, both public and private, from discriminating on the basis of an arrest record or from even asking the standard question that appears on so many application forms: "Have you ever been arrested?"

The new law, signed by Governor Carey on July 30, also provides that "an arrest not ending in a conviction" because of dismissal or acquittal is "the same thing as if the arrest never took place," the civil liberties group said. The law also calls for sealing arrest records and returning photographs and fingerprints in such cases.

The Civil Liberties Union made public an eight-page pamphlet about the new law, which is Chapter 877 of the Laws of 1976, entitled: "How to Get Unarrested."

Exception Noted

"If you were not convicted," the pamphlet said, "you cannot be required to give information about your arrest or the trial or any aspect of the prosecution, unless there is a court order or a specific requirement for such information."

It noted that there is an exception: The new law does not allow government inquiries to their unarrested state would be undercut.

The civil liberties pamphlet stressed that "if you were ever arrested, but not convicted, you are legally innocent."

The new procedures "begin routinely in all criminal cases that end without a conviction after Sept. 1, 1976," the civil liberties group said.

It added they also apply to people whose cases ended before that date. But it said such persons must apply to a court to seal the record—that is, put it into closed files—and to return prints and photographs, and a prosecutor must be notified in advance and may oppose the plea.

Copies of the pamphlet will be free to public agencies, and available at 25 cents apiece to others through the New York Civil Liberties Union, 64 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011.

Residents Protesting Noise At Site of Nuclear Plant

SEABROOK, N.H., Aug. 28 (AP)—Besides the controversy about building a nuclear power plant here, residents are disturbed by the construction noise.

Recent demonstrations at the building site resulted in the arrest of 201 persons. And the plant site has pre-empted the Seabrook town dump.

Now, complaints about round-the-clock work at the site of the $1.6 billion plant may prompt Seabrook selectmen to enforce the town nuisance ordinance. The ordinance could, in effect, ban 24-hour work shifts at the site.

Penitent Czech Father Signs Commandments

PRAGUE (AP)—A straying father humbly signed 10 commandments drafted by his children in order to be allowed to return home, a Czechoslovak daily reported.

The man, a Prague mechanic, had been a model father for many years when a blond neighbor led him astray, the paper reported.

In spite of all entreaties he left his wife and four children to live with his new-found love, only to be ditched by her. He asked to be allowed to return and his former wife said yes, provided the children agreed.

The children, ranging in age from 18 to 10, presented him with 10 rules of conduct to sign if he was to return:

STRIKE AT ATTICA APPEARS AT END

tion when the State Legislature convened in January.

The inmate leaders also were said to have told the men that the strike should be ended because their internal disagreements had pitted one cellblock against another. They said this had come about as a result of numerous rumors in the absence of adequate communications between the five cellblocks that constitute the prison.

According to visitors, newsmen were once again barred from the prison, the bickering among prisoners has resulted in what appeared to be possible physical clashes.

Some of the prisoners asserted, the visitors continued, that the friction could have been avoided if inmate leaders had used the internal radio setup for all their communications with the prisoners instead of sending different leaders to different cellblocks to explain the proposals.

During the present negotiations there were no reports of serious violence among the prisoners. The talks between inmate leaders and correction officials, which were described as ranging in character from quiet to vitriolic, were held in the facility's parole-board meeting room in an atmosphere of diplomacy.

This contrasted sharply with the situation here in 1971 when hostages were taken. Those negotiations ended when the state police stormed the maximum-security prison and opened fire. Before the rebellion ended, 32 inmates and 11 guards had been killed.

Among the current prisoner demands that were agreed to by correction officials were the following:

Reform and liberalization of parole and expansion of work-release and furlough programs.

Relaxation of visitation rules to allow touching, hugging and kissing, and more telephone privileges.

A promise that where possible inmates would be assigned to prisons closer to their homes.

A promise to reduce the overcrowded conditions at Attica, which now has nearly 2,000 prisoners, although it was designed for 1,600.

Daily showers instead of the present two a week.

Procedures for review by the inmate grievance review board of disciplinary punishment for infractions within the prison.

Most of the demands that would not require action by the State Legislature were granted almost immediately by correction officials.

Commissioner Benjamin Ward and other prison officials said they forwarded the legislative proposals without endorsement, although Mr. Ward has said that sentences longer than five years constitute retribution rather than rehabilitation.

"Society has to make up its mind whether it wants rehabilitation or retribution," he said during the negotiations.

The guards' union at the prison, Local 1040 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, has come out vehemently against the proposed agreement, saying it was not consulted on the course of the talks, even when they concerned security matters.

Ronald Wert, president of the guard's union, said during an earlier interview that he "resented administrators flying in from Albany to handle problems that should be settled by Attica officials."

Many visitors to the prison the last three days said prisoners had complained of being harassed by guards who were unhappy with the settlement.

From Survivors of the Pennsylvania Epidemic Being Tested for Possible Traces of a Toxic Substance

E. K. ALTMAN
New York Times
3, Pa., Aug. 28

From survivors of a disease that people in Pennsylvania tested in a laboratory in Massachusetts find the cause.

Dr. Horowitz is doing the tests at the Lincoln Laboratory in Lexington, Mass., with Dr. Lee Grodzin of M.I.T., and Dr. Jean Ryan of the laboratory and Michael Aronson, a Harvard student. Results are not expected for several days.

Although the physicians are working with entire strands of hair from two victims and to the rest of the controls, the scientists are focusing on the inch closest to the root. This portion, which represents about two months' growth, is being scanned to determine if nickel or other metals were extruded from the body into the hair during the two months.

Dr. Horowitz said he had asked Pennsylvania health officials for the hair samples and a "long shot" way of possibly learning just what killed the 28 people and sickened 150 others might be detected a few millimeters from the hair root. Dr. Paul Horowitz, the head of the physics team, said today in a telephone interview. "It could provide us with a window into the past."

4 on Test Team

Dr. Horowitz said he was using a device called a scanning proton microprobe for proton-induced X-ray analysis as a new way of testing hair.

"We can detect any element heavier than sodium on the periodic table," he said. "That leaves out only a few like beryllium and magnesium. But it's great for the heavy ones. We can see lead, arsenic, mercury, nickel, iron, copper, zinc, among others."

Dr. Horowitz said his experience in testing hair specimens with the new technique was limited to three outbreaks, involving patients who breathed arsine fumes in Britain, suffered methyl mercury poisoning in Iraq and suffered lead poisoning in New York.

He said his request to Pennsylvania health officials for samples was prompted in part by news accounts of Dr. F. William Sunderman Jr.'s findings of high levels of nickel in specimens from victims of the mysterious disease.

Dr. Sunderman said tests he had done at the University of Connecticut had shown, "suggestive but inconclusive" evidence that nickel carbonyl might have caused the outbreak.

Dr. Horowitz said, "We're hoping that if it is nickel perhaps we can verify it or if it is something else we can find out what it is." Even if nickel caused the outbreak, he said, it might not be found in the hair because it might not have entered the bloodstream.

Morton D. Rosen, the Pennsylvania deputy secretary for health, said in an interview that workers at the state health laboratory had pulled three strands of hair from unidentified survivors of the disease and from controls and mailed them in a coded fashion to Dr. Horowitz.

After Dr. Horowitz opened the envelopes he and his colleagues cleaned each strand of hair with alcohol and acetone. Then they put each strand in a sample holder that moved back and forth as a proton beam shined on the hair.

A proton is an elementary particle that is identical with the nucleus of the hydrogen atom and is a basic constituent of all other atomic nuclei.

When the proton beam strikes the samples, the X-rays produced form a set of spectral lines, or fingerprints, on an oscilloscope that are characteristic for each element in the periodic table.

In doing the tests, the physicists pass the beams through on a first run to see what elements are in the spectrum. Then, they repeat the test to focus on specific elements. The date is entered into a computer that helps plot the presence of a particular element along the length of the hair strand.

Because scalp hair grows about half an inch a month, the length of hair represents time. Accordingly, if the physicists see a sharp peak on the graph produced from tests on the hair strands from victims of the mysterious disease, it could represent an exposure to a poison in the recent past.

However, there are limits to the new technique.

"It may well be that whatever it is, we cannot see it," Dr. Horowitz said. "We're not sensitive to organic poisons that do not contain heavy materials. We couldn't see cyanide or carbon or nitrogen with this technique. But the longer you wait, the better off you are, because the information does not really disappear from hair" for quite some time.

But "if we see nothing, that will prove nothing," he said.

U.N. YEARBOOK GIVES POPULATION TRENDS

UNITED NATIONS, Aug. 28 (Reuters)—The tiny Republic of San Marino in the Italian Apennines has the world's lowest infant mortality rate, while on Norfolk Island in the South Pacific birth itself is something of a rarity, according to the 1975 edition of the United Nations Statistical Yearbook just published.

The 914-page book has data ranging from the number of people in the world—estimated at 3.89 billion in mid-1974—to the percentage of dwellings in rural Brazil with flush toilets—0.8 percent.

The yearbook reports that San Marino, with a population of 19,000, has an infant mortality rate of 9.2 for every 1,000 live births. It is followed by Sweden, 9.6; Finland, 10.1; Norway, 10.5; the Netherlands and Japan, both 11.3. In Africa and parts of Asia the infant mortality rate is between 100 and 200.

Norfolk Island, an Australian-administered territory with about 2,000 inhabitants, has the world's lowest birth rate, 9.5 birth per 1,000 population.

Judge Says Confiscation Ignores Local Mores

By ARNOLD H. LURASCH
A procedure that the Government uses to confiscate allegedly obscene material has been declared unconstitutional by a Federal judge in Manhattan.

The decision, issued by Judge Marvin E. Frankel in the Federal District Court, involves a photographer who fought against the Government's seizure of a magazine that had been mailed to him from Germany.

The Government intercepts mail believed to contain pornography sent to this country from overseas. Judge Frankel said, adding that the procedure was carried out under a Federal law designed to prevent "penetration of our shores by obscene materials."

"Customs personnel at our various ports staff this bulwark," the judge continued. "They spend their time opening mail and packages, having evidently learned what to suspect. Materials believed to be of the forbidden kind are turned over to the United States Attorney for the district in which the port lies."

"The addressees receive notice that their mail has been opened and potentially condemned and that they are entitled to claim it. Most ignore the notices, and their things are confiscated by default to be destroyed."

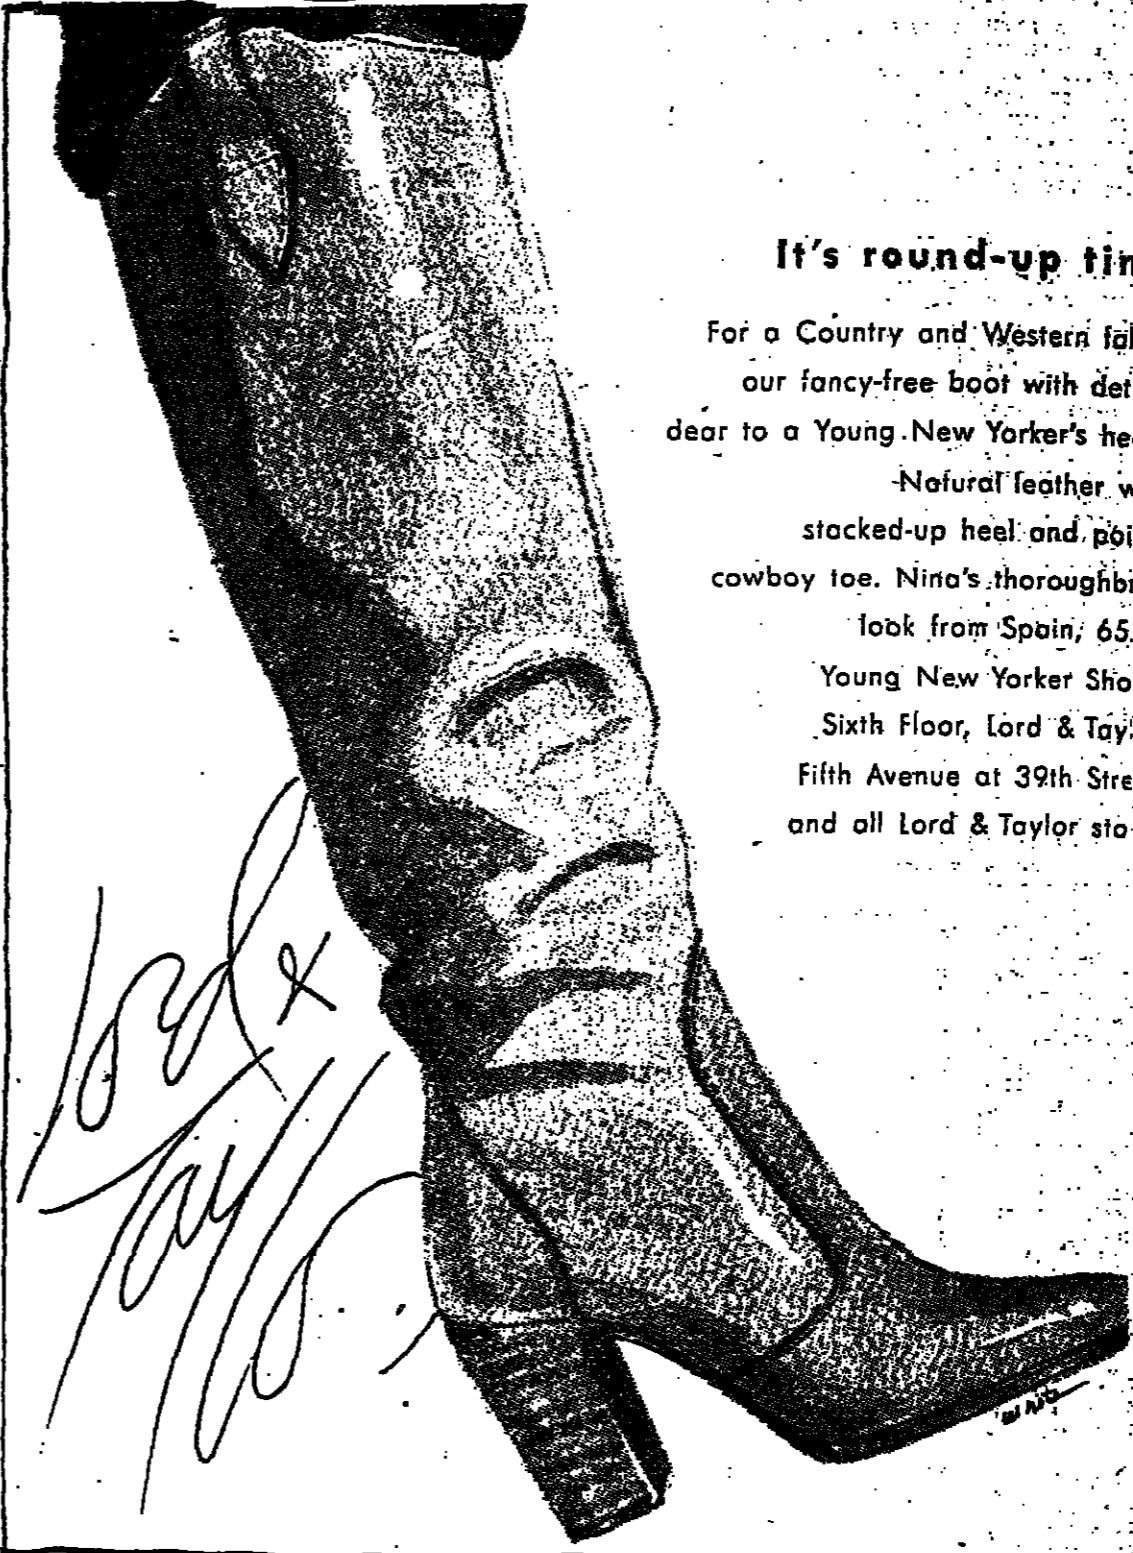

An Unusual Step
But the photographer whose magazine was seized in this case, Bruce A. Long of Lancaster, Pa., took the unusual step of coming to New York for a court hearing to claim his magazine.

Judge Frankel observed that "the 29-year-old claimant hid himself here from Lancaster, Pa., on the appointed day and demanded delivery of the magazine intercepted on its way to him from a friend in Germany."

Appearing without a lawyer, Mr. Long, who, the judge observed, was "once a member of the Lancaster Mayor's committee on community standards on pornography," presented his case to the judge and later obtained a lawyer's assistance to write a legal brief attacking the seizure of his mail.

The judge's 18-page decision last Wednesday ruled that the procedure under the statute unconstitutional deprived Mr. Long of material that might be acceptable in his own community.

ON Aug. 28—In few people making fortunes off the sale of such public rights, but in making these fortunes, the public is being forced to pay higher prices for the goods and commodities brought to their shelves by motor common carriers.

"For no one can ever dare say that, when prices in five or six figures are paid to purchase these rights, these prices do not appear in the rate levels set by the purchasing truckers."

After the hearing, Representative Millicent Fenwick, Republican of New Jersey, who is a member of the subcommittee, wrote George M. Stafford, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, demanding a list of every purchase of an I.C.C. operating right since 1973 and the amount paid for each license.

Mr. Stafford, noting that there were more than 7,000 such transactions between January 1973 and May 1976 and that many of the case records were stored in a warehouse, refused Mrs. Fenwick's request.

"I trust you will understand that the time and cost of such a search would draw too heavily on the commission's resources already taxed by major projects," he wrote her.

In her reply on Aug. 9, Mrs. Fenwick reported the response. "I think these figures are more than sufficiently important to warrant a search and disclosure to the American public," she said, repeating her request for detailed information about the sale of public operating rights.

Toy Giveaway Unbearable for Bank

LOS ANGELES, Aug. 28 (UPI)—Only now is the full story emerging of the great "Teddy Bear Caper" at Crocker National Bank, but it carries a message for those who would mix bears, money, children, depositors, tellers and bank vice presidents.

The heroes of the piece (or villains, depending on how one looks at it) were those little stuffed animals with bright button eyes and stitched smiles that have long been the companions of countless girls and boys.

Just before the Christmas season last year, the promotion department at Crocker—the nation's 15th largest bank, with 358 California branches—came up with "Sunny the Bear."

The deal was that anyone who opened a new checking account of $100 or more would be given a bear.

"Everyone Wanted One" Angela Bohning, then handling new accounts at the Palos Verdes branch, remembers that "it started out great but then problems began to arise."

She added: "There were the bears sitting on the counters, cute as could be, and everyone wanted one. Customers who already had accounts insisted they should get a bear. One man who had a $50,000 savings account threatened to take out his whole deposit unless he got a bear."

"We tried to tell them to just withdraw $100 and open another account and some of them did," she continued. "Mothers would come in with two or more kids in tow and each child wanted a bear, of course. But it was one account, one bear, no more and no less, so they had to open two or three checking accounts."

On top of everything else, a shortage of bears began to develop. Bank officials sent down the word that there must be a strict accounting for each bear.

"I got so at our branch that we had a bear count at the end of business every day," Mrs. Bohning recalled. "The tellers had to balance bears some time early this year, but it took weeks before the outcry subsided.

"I remember one woman who marched in with a teddy bear she had bought at a department store," Mrs. Bohning said. "She said her son would have nothing to do with it because it didn't look like Sunny. She wanted to trade it in on a Crocker bear, but the bears were all gone."

In all 100,000 Sunnies went to bank customers. David Sanson, a spokesman for the bank, said that although it may try other promotions, "we will never come up with anything like the bears."

Farm Workers Settle Suit On Epidemic at Their Camp

MIAMI, Aug. 28 (AP)—An out-of-court settlement for $250,000 has been reached in a $5.5 million damage suit filed by 157 farm workers sickened in a typhoid fever epidemic at their labor camp.

After deductions of $73,000 for lawyers' fees, $10,000 for expenses such as court costs and $29,000 for medical bills, the workers will receive $800.06 each.

The workers blamed the water supply at the South Dade Labor Camp in Homestead for the typhoid outbreak, which hit 220 people in 1973. The camp was operated by the Homestead Housing Authority.

The agency's executive director, George Eicher, said that "nothing contaminating the water was ever found."

Our knowledgeable, low pressure, salespeople are one very good reason why even if you're not thinking about buying hifi right now, you'll enjoy coming in to The Hifi Show.

Another reason, is our exciting program of audio seminars and clinics. These range from fascinating multi-media presentations, to free clinics where you can have your components checked out by factory experts.

Call, or drop by, the Tech Hifi store nearest you to find out what seminars or clinics are happening in your area this week.

Finally, no hifi show would be complete without a mind-boggling component giveaway. So Tech Hifi is giving away a $7,000 Super System with state-of-the-art components from AKG, B*TC, Utr, ElectroVoice, Koss, Micro-Acoustics, Ohm, Phase Linear, Pioneer, SAE, TEAC, and Technics. So if you want to get the lowest prices on brand-name hifi components, come in to Tech Hifi (we get the best deal, so we can give you the best deal).

At Tech Hifi. Where our massive buying power makes our everyday prices so low, it's like having a "sale" all the time.

If you're looking for a high performance, yet reasonably-priced, home music system—you can't do better than this one for only $329.

The stereo receiver is the Pioneer SX 434, with ample power for most listening situations, and a tuner section that compares with receivers selling for $100 more! EPI 60 "Linear Sound" loudspeakers deliver the kind of accurate, widerange, response you expect from an EPI product. A high quality Garrard 440 M automatic turntable with a base, dustcover, and an unusually rugged Pickering magnetic cartridge complete this value-packed system. (For only $20 more, you can substitute big Studio Design 36 loudspeakers for the EPI's).

And for only $399, we're more than willing to guarantee that you won't find a better-sounding system than this next one anywhere.

It features the excellent Marantz 2215 stereo receiver, with 15 watts minimum RMS per channel at 8 ohms from 40 to 20,000 Hz., with no more than 0.8% Total Harmonic Distortion. That's plenty of power to achieve truly satisfying volume levels with the KLH 101 2-way loudspeakers. The high performance Philips GA 427 belt-drive turntable with an AudioTechnica AT90E Dual Magnet cartridge complete the system.

Other "sale priced" systems start as low as $199.

We also have an excellent selection of New and Demonstrator components on sale this week—many at, or just above, dealer cost!

Hospitals Warned of Explosives Formed in Plumbing

ATLANTA, Aug. 28 (UPI)—Federal health officials warned today that it was possible that explosives more dangerous than nitroglycerine had been formed by chemical reactions in plumbing of more than 15,000 hospital and clinical laboratories in the United States.

The Center for Disease Control said an alert about the danger of the explosives had been issued by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health.

The most dangerous explosive chemical compound was identified as sodium azide, which is formed by automatic blood cell counters that are used in more than 15,000 hospital and clinical labs. Decontamination recommendations have already been sent by the institute to most of these laboratories.

The center said that after blood counts were completed, the waste, which includes azide, was commonly discharged into a drain, bathing the drain pipe with solutions of sodium azide. It said that over a period of time, the azide reacted with copper, lead, brass or solder in the plumbing system to form an accumulation of lead or copper azide.

Lead azide, according to the center's report, "is a more sensitive primary explosive than nitroglycerine and a more effective detonating agent than mercury fulminate in comparison with lead azide, copper azide is even more explosive and too sensitive to be used commercially." Sodium azide was identified as a preservative used in many diagnostic products.

The center, in its weekly Morbidity and Mortality Report, said the institute recently learned of sodium azide-related explosions associated with automatic blood cell counters at a number of hospitals in the United States and Canada.

It said that one explosion had occurred while a constant-temperature water bath, in which sodium azide had been used as a preservative, was being repaired.

"These explosions have the propensity to propel metallic fragments over a wide area and the potential for causing serious injury to exposed workers and others in the vicinity," the center said.

When the hazard was brought to the attention of Coulter Electronics Inc., the major supplier of automatic blood cell counters to United States laboratories, the company introduced an azide-free product, according to the center.

The center said that accumulation of lead and copper azides in plumbing systems could be retarded by thoroughly flushing with large amounts of water several times a day.

The use of copper-free and lead-free lines between the point of discharge of azide and the nearest pipe in which there is a good stream of water, or the use of azide-free products, may prevent future accumulation of explosive azides, the center said. But it warned that these measures would not decontaminate plumbing already containing the explosive compounds.

Boa Constrictor Finds It Can't Sleep Anywhere

CEDARBURG, Wis. (AP)—Brutus is a 6-year-old boa constrictor with his own ideas about where he should sleep.

Joy Berdelman said Brutus has a wicker basket in a bedroom to sleep in. But when her washing machine broke down recently, she found that Brutus had wrapped himself around the drive belt.

She called the Ozaukee County Sheriff's department for help, and Allan Woda, a deputy, called John Cook, an appliance repairman, who said he had handled snakes as a fifth-grade teacher.

"At first I was a little leery of going in there," the deputy said. "But you know, that snake was really pretty from up close."

Mr. Woda tilted the machine backwards while Mr. Cook cut the drive belt and Mrs. Berdelman pulled Brutus out.

Moyghan Charges 3 of His Rivals Are 'Lip Service' Liberals

AS P. RONAN, a Democratic liberal, charged some Democrats themselves liberals, the American is sick and that surgery can save it can be saved.

incremental improvement that the traditional liberalism of the Democratic Party has always sought and always fought for."

Among those who practiced this "so-called liberalism," Mr. Moyghan told questioners, were three of his opponents for the nomination: Representative Bella S. Abzug; Ramsey Clark, former United States Attorney General, and Paul O'Dwyer, President of the New York City Council.

Asked about the remaining candidate in the five-way contest, Abraham Hirschfeld, a Manhattan businessman, Mr. Moyghan replied, "I don't know about him."

With the campaign getting hotter as the Sept. 14 primary draws closer, Mrs. Abzug and Mr. Clark mounted their own attacks against Mr. Moyghan.

Mrs. Abzug, who was campaigning in Harlem and in Cutchess, Ulster and Columbia Counties, asserted in a statement that Mr. Moyghan appeared to be "the Republicans' favorite Democrat" and that, in turn, he appeared willing to serve a Republican administration, no matter what its policies.

Noting that Mr. Moyghan had served in the administrations of former President Richard M. Nixon and President Ford, Mrs. Abzug said he pretended that it was the duty of any citizen to serve any President who summoned him.

"But in fact, President are associated with specific policies and actions, and Mr. Moyghan served Richard Nixon beyond the call of duty," Mrs. Abzug asserted.

She said that on leaving the Nixon Administration he had praised the President for "singular courage and compassion."

She also accused Mr. Moyghan of improperly trying to depict critics of the Pentagon's "huge $113 billion military budget" as would-be isolationists who wanted to withdraw from world affairs. He knew this to be untrue, she added.

"Cheating Our City" Mr. Clark, who campaigned in Manhattan and Queens, said Mr. Moyghan favored "an overly large military budget over the admittedly critical needs of New Yorkers."

Utility's Nuclear Plants Issues Most of Its Power

HARTFORD (AP)—Northeast Utilities says it set records in May when 68 percent of the electricity used by its customers was generated by nuclear power.

The company said the monthly total was the highest since the Connecticut Yankee nuclear plant in Haddam began commercial operations in 1968.

Northeast also said nuclear power had produced more than one billion kilowatt-hours of electricity that month, a record high for the Northeast system.

The nuclear plants involved are Connecticut Yankee, Millstone I and II in Waterford, Massachusetts Yankee, Vermont Yankee and Maine Yankee.

Lelan F. Sillin Jr., chairman and president of Northeast, said nuclear power was expected to produce more than half the electricity used by the utility's customers in 1976.

BUCKLEY CRITICIZES CONGRESS ON KOREA

Senator James L. Buckley, Conservative-Republican of New York, asserted yesterday that the failure of Congress to honor commitments to modernize South Korea's armed forces had emboldened the North Koreans to commit the kinds of actions "that can lead to a bloody war on the mainland of Asia."

At a news conference in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., he cited the "vicious" killing by North Koreans of Maj. Arthur G. Bonifas and First Lieut. Mark T. Barrett while they were supervising a tree-pruning operation in the demilitarized zone on Aug. 18.

"It is time the Democrat-controlled Congress lives up to its obligations," he said. "I urge my colleagues in the Congress and others to join me in demanding that South Korea be given the military equipment it needs to keep the peace in that part of Asia."

Representative Peter A. Peyer, the Westchester Republican who is opposing Mr. Buckley for the Republican nomination, held staff meetings yesterday and then taped radio commercials before going to Long Island to campaign.

Court Changes Urged

He suggested extending to the entire court system "the concept of the small claims court" where, he said, there was no plea bargaining, time-consuming pretrial examinations, postponements, lengthy detentions or clogged calendars.

Mr. O'Dwyer returned yesterday from a visit to Ireland and went to Long Island for some campaigning.

Mr. Moyghan, who attacked "so-called liberalism" in a speech before 200 people in front of the Empire State Building, said he believed in the "reformist liberalism" of the great Democratic leaders of the past.

"It was a tradition based on the belief that the American political system is sound and healthy at its foundations and that the object of all reform is to improve the system, to make it work better, to make it truer to the ideals of individual liberty and equal opportunity which it helped establish in this nation," he said.

School-Space Use By Agencies Set

The Board of Education has prepared guidelines for the use of underutilized space in the city's public schools by municipal agencies and qualified community-service organizations, following enactment of a new state law permitting such use during daytime hours. The City Planning Commission estimates that city agencies and community groups in one school district it studied covering Staten Island, could cut rental costs from an average of $4.20 a square foot annually for space now used in private buildings to $2.50 a square foot for shared space in schools.

New York Seeks Bikeway Funds

New York City has applied for $1.16 million in Federal funds to start work on a 17-mile bikeway along the Belt and Shore Parkways in Brooklyn and Queens, a 10-mile bikeway extending from Pelham Parkway to Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx and a bicycle path across the Brooklyn Bridge. The city's Transportation Administration has also begun a 10-month program to study the feasibility of a commuter bicycle system in Manhattan.

Westchester's Dart Sniper Strikes Again

By PRANAY GUPTA
The mysterious sniper who has attacked nearly 20 women in Westchester County this summer with a dart-gun has struck again after almost a month of inactivity, the Yonkers police said yesterday.

They reported that the sniper struck a 52-year-old woman at about 11 P.M. on Friday. The woman, Barbara Macheinski, of 30 Beverly Drive, Rye, was visiting her mother, who lives at 9 Sunnysbrook Road in Yonkers. Mr. Macheinski was sitting on the edge of a bed in a first-floor bedroom when the attack occurred, the police said. "Something like the kick of a mule hit me," Mrs. Macheinski said, adding that the bedroom's open windows were covered by a screen. "It came right through the screen and it was a little dart with green feathers," she said. "I remembered about this dart business, so I just went down on the floor and mother and

I crawled around and called the police." The police then escorted Mrs. Macheinski to Lawrence Hospital in Yonkers, where physicians removed the dart from her upper left buttock. Advice From Police Physicians at the hospital said that the injury was not serious. Yesterday, too, the Yonkers police once again advised women, especially those living on the ground floor, to keep their windows closed between 9 P.M. and 5 A.M.

Almost all of the 20 or so women who have been attacked by the sniper lived on ground floors. Only one woman has been seriously wounded so far, a Greenburgh, N.Y., resident who was shot on June 23. She was partly paralyzed after a dart lodged in her carotid artery. The Yonkers police said yesterday that although they were continuing their investigation of various sniper attacks, they had no leads on the culprit's identity. "It's even conceivable that there could be more than one sniper," one police official said. The dart-gun attacks have taken place mostly in the Yonkers, Greenburgh and Eastchester areas, according to the police.

Campfire Girls Moving West

PORTLAND, Ore., Aug. 28 (AP)—Directors of the national board of Campfire Girls Inc. have voted to move the organization's corporate headquarters from New York to Kansas City, Mo. The supply division in New York and the national service center in Englewood, Colo., will also be relocated to Kansas City, the directors said. Clifton E. Woodcock of Detroit, chairman of the board, said it would be less expensive to operate headquarters in Kansas City than in New York. He added that travel time and money would be saved by having the headquarters in a more central location.

The Delicate Frostiness Of Finely Etched Glass

By VIRGINIA LEE WARREN
Fashionable and expensive restaurants started it, this return to etched or sculptured glass panels that, in style, are Nouveau or Art Deco—or maybe something in between. Are they likely to spread from Maxwell's Plum, Grand Café, Crawdaddy, La Goulue and the soon-to-be-opened Tavern-on-the-Green, into apartments and houses?

Like Lalique
The artists who are making the panels think so. Recently Daniel Krief, a French architect who now lives here and who planned La Goulue's décor (modified Art Nouveau) glass, used etched glass for three doors in a $500,000 house he designed in Alpine, N.Y.

Etched glass—* tries to achieve the soft, delicately frosted look of Lalique—has been chosen for two big dining tables by Burt Wayne, the interior designer. One was for the New Rochelle home of Joshua and Dorothy Hacker, the other for the West Side apartment of Marcel and Belda Lindenbaum.

And in East Northport, L.I., Harry and Roberta Lampert have in their bedroom an etched glass headboard that incorporates zodiac signs.

Both of the dining tables and the headboard were designed by the Shefts brothers—Charles, Samuel, Isidore—who own the Carved Glass Company on East 132d Street. It is their concern that has turned out the panels for Maxwell's Plum, Grand Café (this meant copying some Erté fashion drawings). Quo Vadis, Italian Pavilion and Argenteuil. The Carved Glass Company is also doing the panels for Tavern-on-the-Green.

Wallpaper Copied
"Charlie Shefts is a real artist," said Dorothy Hacker the other day, as she fondly regarded her 8-by-10-foot plate glass dining table with Mr. Shefts' signature down in one corner. "I wanted the wallpaper copied," she said as she looked around the lofty room whose paper is silvery, "and look what he did with the flowers and the birds in it."

The table also has a six-inch border that copies a design in the paper on the dining room's ceiling.

Mrs. Hacker, who is in real estate development in New Rochelle, and Mr. Hacker, who owns filling stations, entertain a good deal, they said. "And with folding chairs, we've had 20 at the table," said Mrs. Hacker, "but with the gray velvet chairs that belong in the dining room the number is usually 10."

Birds and Flowers
The Lindenbaums, whose 5 by 8 foot dining table copies the birds and flowers in the Chinoiserie wallpaper in the adjoining gallery, is used by the whole family—parents and five children aged 2 to 16—on Friday and Saturday nights.

"At other times," said Mrs. Lindenbaum, "it will be just my husband and me, or just us with our guests; that's because the children have different mealtimes." The only thing she regrets about the table is its size. "I wish we'd gotten a bigger one," she said. "We ordered this size so we wouldn't have to hoist it into the apartment. Then, when it came, we had to hoist it anyway."

Zodiac Signs
The headboard that Mr. and Mrs. Lampert had Isidore Shefts design is about 6 by 3½ feet and it incorporates the zodiac signs of the family—Scorpio, Sagittarius and Taurus for the children and, for the parents, Aries and Sagittarius necklaces on a man and woman who seem to be floating dreamily through space. Clouds, sun, moon and lots of stars are in the background.

The headboard has been installed, with lights behind it, in a 25-foot wall of built-in closets, and while Mr. Lampert, who has the Town and Country Dental Studios in Freeport, L.I., and his wife are thinking of selling their house, they have decided that if they do, they will have the headboard ripped out and take it with them. "We love it more and more, and so do the children," said Mrs. Lampert.

Dorothy Hacker, top, points to signature of Charles Sheft on her glass table. The table above, also designed by Mr. Sheft, is prized by another family.

Out From Under Wr

By LAWRENCE VAN GELDER

Tucked away for half a century or so as the lining of those famous British raincoats, Burberry's plaid has given up making a fashion understatement and is having something of a coming-out party.

The plaid—black-and-white and red stripes on a beige background—is seeing the light of day this autumn in a variety of forms.

There are cashmere scarves for men and women ($30); a women's raincoat of 100 percent cotton ($15); men's and women's shirts of 100 percent cotton ($30); a women's handbag ($35); a men's sponge bag ($25); a throw rug ($130); an assortment of luggage from tote bag to suitcase ($60 to $85); and a unisex umbrella ($40) that is said to be an improved version of the men's and women's umbrellas that were the first manifestations here—a couple of years ago—of the emergent plaid.

From 18 Haymarket in London, the headquarters of the conceit by Thomas Burberry in England, in 1856, comes the plaid is a registered design the company as a lining.

A spokesman for Burberry the emergence of the plaid construed as an effort to promote the company name by means of the value of the plaid.

You can play a hot set of tennis. Then relax with an icy swimmer by the pool. Or a mug of cold beer in the Loft Lounge.

There's golf. And a health spa. Bicycles. And winding country lanes. Beautiful rooms rich with the aroma of fresh hewn wood. Quiet candlelit dinners. And dancing into the night.

WEST SIDE ROAD IS MOVING AHEAD

Work Slated to Start Soon —Residents Plan Lawsuit

The plan to begin dismantling a one-mile section of the old, elevated West Side Highway this fall has moved another important step toward receiving 90 percent Federal financing.

But West Side groups opposed to the $2.5 million project, which calls for replacing the old highway with a 12-lane Interstate System road called the Westway, are ready to go to court to try to block the demolition.

Austin H. Emery, regional director of the State Transportation Department, said last week that demolition could be expected to start "in a couple of months" and would have a beneficial effect on the community. The section involved is from Jane to 26th Streets, but the work would be done in two stages, the first being from Jane to 14th Street.

No Adverse Effect

According to Mr. Emery, regional Federal highway officials agree with the city and state that demolition will not have an adverse effect on the surrounding environment. A draft document to that effect has just been released, carrying the signature of Victor Taylor, divisional engineer for the Federal Highway Administration.

The West Side Ad Hoc Committee Against the Interstate Highway, claiming the backing of numerous other groups immediately announced plans to go to court "to forestall demolition." John McNally, spokesman for the committee, said: "We regard this move to demolish the elevated highway as nothing but an attempt to steal a march and begin de facto construction of the 12-lane interstate highway."

According to the committee, this would be a "major Federal action" having a "terrible impact" on West Side communities—in fact, "a death blow."

Mr. Emery said that the old structure had to be taken down for safety reasons and because it hinders circulation of traffic on the street below.

3 TRUSTEES QUIT FIRE PENSION TALKS

The three trustees of the Uniformed Fire Officers Association walked out of a meeting of the Fire Department Pension Board Friday and vowed to boycott future sessions to protest City Hall's recent freeze on annual salary increments and its order that lieutenants work for absent captains.

But the trustees control only 3.5 of the board's 24 votes, and the necessary quorum of 14 was available to vote on 88 retirement applications and other items on the calendar.

After the walkout, Battalion Chief Edwin Jennings, head of the fire officers' union, said that if the increment freeze remains, the four trustees of the Uniformed Firefighters Association which represents firemen, would boycott next month's board meeting, thus denying it eight more votes. Such a step would eliminate a quorum and paralyze action on pension applications.

Chief Jennings said the freeze was a "direct violation" of its contract and was imposed by the Beame administration "without notification or negotiations."

A spokesman for the Beame administration denied the charge. He said that the city had no intention of bowing to say "psychological pressure" to finance the increments because money was not available for them.

As a nation, we have just started our third century. As people, we naturally go back to the first binary fission of that originally adventurous amoeba. Our ethnic patterns include everything, yet contain nothing. We are a melting pot that never melted into anything more substantial than anger; yet, our ethnic and racial strains, the pioneer spirit of a new civilization taking over, sometimes cruelly, often by force and genocide, an underpopulated continent, and a fundamentalist belief in a new world in which anything was possible, will always color the American view of life, whether we came here to better ourselves or whether we came here as slaves.

The Arts in America: Optimism Tempered by Need

As we move into this third century of our American arts, what do we find? In the first place, it was never very easy. When you are planting rose bushes in a pioneer land, you are going to seem (one searches for the right word and lands on a truism, simply because it is true) provincial. Today the art scene in America is far from provincial; yet, there is still a certain nervousness to it, a certain feeling that perhaps it should have happened in Europe, or that perhaps it has. As a comparative newcomer to this new-found land, I believe we are emerging from this particular syndrome of provincialism. In dance, for example, and in painting, I would have thought America leads the world. We lack some sophistication in public subsidy of the arts—a lack that could even prove fatal. Yet, perhaps in a Panglossian way, I feel confident that we are doing better than we think. On the eve of our third century, The New York Times asked a few crucial questions of a few crucial people in the American art world. The people asked were not arbitrarily selected but were picked as representatives of the art scene not especially for their achievements, but more for their credibility as typical art figures. Their answers showed diversity of interest, but, at the same time, what might be termed a focus of purpose.

It is said that on her deathbed, Gertrude Stein murmured plaintively: "What is the answer?" Not one of her friends clustered around her last hours was prepared to volunteer a statement; so, after a certain properly dramatic pause, she murmured: "Well, then, what is the question?"

Questions and answers—the two are pertinent. What are the arts going to be like in the year 2076? That was not the question we asked our celebrities. Yet, in essence, that was the answer we received.

We divided our question, like Gaul, into three parts. We asked: "First, in your Continued on Page 16"

ay Not Be 'High' Culture, but It Can Be Brilliant

By HILTON KRAMER

EVERY season in the arts brings high hopes of spectacular achievement and stunning discovery—the hope, above all else, of the big, transfiguring experience that sweeps everything else in its path and leaves us, exhilarated and even a little dazed, looking at the surrounding scene with new eyes. For the experience of art, the experience of all the arts, is dynamic, refusing to remain fixed or at rest. There is a reason, after all, why we speak of movements in the arts. The life of art, like life itself, grows, develops, declines, renews itself, and continues, whether for good effect or bad, on its headlong course. It is constantly producing new offspring—some legitimate, some not; some of mysterious parentage, some still-born—and it is the energy of the effort, the sheer momentum of creative possibility and production, that engages and bedazzles and even exhausts us before we pause to consider what it is, indeed, that has elicited this eager and untrammelled response. When, nowadays, we do pause to reflect upon the almost ceaseless flow of artistic energies that each season offers for both our pleasure and our instruction, we are likely to be struck by a somber and sobering fact. The sheer quantity of events seems to know no bounds, and the sheer volume of talent remains not only undiminished but, if anything, even larger than we remember from earlier times. Yet something significant, something central and indispensable, is missing in all this bustle. We are without masters. Picasso and Auden and Str-vinsky, Brecht and Max Ernst and Walker Evans, Ezra Pound and Edmund Wilson: the last of the giants are largely gone, leaving the scene without conspicuous successors. There are exceptions, of course—the most outstanding, I suppose, are George Balanchine and Sir Frederick Ashton, Alexander Calder and Willem de Kooning, Aaron Copland and Robert Motherwell, Clifford Still and Joan Miró and Henry Moore—but for the most part, the arts today are leaderless or, what comes to the same thing, led by artists whose work looks back to earlier glories but does not promise any clear purchase on the future.

I do not speak here of performing artists, who, especially in the fields of music and dance, continue to emerge each season in an almost reckless profusion. I have in mind, rather, those primary talents responsible for creating what is to be performed and looked at, for shaping the very materials of art. We may derive endless delight from the work of artists who are not—in this primary, form-giving sense—masters themselves, and we surely could not do without them, for they are the very bloodstream of the life of art. But it is the masters who bring new vitality to that bloodstream, who renew the arts with their energy and vision and outsize demands, and it is the masters who are missing today.

In the visual arts, certainly, it has been a commonplace for some time to speak of an "open situation"—a situation in which everything is now felt to be possible, from the most arcane to the most reactionary styles, but in which nothing is seen to be absolutely necessary. It is, among much else, precisely this conviction of the absolute that true mastery brings to the arts. In the presence of a master, no artistic situation remains as "open" and as pluralistic as ours; it is everywhere seen to be today. The master imposes a vision that significantly alters the vision of others—especially of other artists. He shapes a language for others to use. He isolates issues, identifies subjects, and creates a realm of consciousness that others may explore and develop. He overturns expectation, and offers us a new emotion. A master redefines the world for us.

Artistic mastery is often—in the short run, at least—disruptive and alarming, and the sense of elation it brings Continued on Page 26

Papps) up while we were otherwise attending to what we thought was our solemn duty. Official culture is something that happens after 6 o'clock at night. It is a statey affair, for which the consumer is expected to dress up like a duchess or a penguin. "Art," wrote Edward Sapir in 1922, "may be made to mean divers things, but whatever it means the term itself demands respectful attention and calls forth, normally, a pleasantly polished state of mind, an expectation of lofty satisfactions." Exactly. "One old lady who wants her head lifted up wouldn't be so bad," said the late Flannery O'Connor, "but you multiply her two hundred and fifty thousand times and what you get is a book club." The consumers of official culture are a book club. A season is the box, in which the book of the month arrives. Official culture is good for us: We must believe this, or we wouldn't subsidize it. Most of the $80 million a year spent by the National Endowment for the Arts goes to official culture—to museums and theaters and opera houses and art galleries and symphony orchestras and dance companies. Then there are matching grants from state arts councils and civic organizations, from foundations and corporations. The apparatus of official culture is expensive. Although its custodians argue with some justice that more people go to plays, concerts, dance programs, museums and libraries than go to ball games, it still doesn't pay for itself. And so we help pay for it, not on the scale of, say, a Germany—or even, per capita, a Cana-

Broadway Will Boom With Drama

in repertory, on successive evenings. "The Last Meeting of the Knights of the White Magnolia" opens on Sept. 21, followed by "Lu Ann Hampton Laverdy Oberlander" and "The Oldest Living Graduate." Looking at his schedule of theater parties, Ronald Lee, head of Theater Party Associates, says, "The hottest show of them all is 'Texas Trilogy!'"

Once again the New York Theater will welcome a boatload of dramatic and comic successes from London: Harold Pinter's "No Man's Land," starring Sir Ralph Richardson and Sir John Gielgud; Simon Gray's "Otherwise Engaged," directed by Mr. Pinter; Trevor Griffiths' "Comedians" directed by Mike Nichols; David Storey's "The Farm," directed by Marshall W. Mason; Ben Travers's farce "The Bed Before Yesterday," starring Carol Channing, and Tom Stoppard's "Dirty Linen."

American writers will be adequately represented, although not necessarily on Broadway. New plays are expected from Arthur Miller, Edward Albee, Jack Gelber, Ed Bullins, David Mamet and Sam Shepard.

Stars will act in the classics. On Broadway Liv Ullmann will be "Anna Christie" and George C. Scott will be "Sly Fox" in Larry Gelbart's new version of "Volpone." Frank Langella will play Heinrich von Kleist at the

Patrick Hines and Diane Ladd will be in Preston Jones's "A Texas Trilogy," the season's "most anticipated event." Jerry Lewis, left, will star in "Hellzapoppin," and Mildred Dunnock in "Days in the Trees."

Wallace Shawn, a workshop of "Electra" (starring Cicely Tyson) and a new version of "Dracula" by Stanley Silverman, Richard Foreman and Marshall Brickman.

Almost all the Broadway theaters are booked. Bernard Jacobs, chairman of the Shubert organization, scans his list and counts not only openings, but interim bookings and backup shows waiting to face an audience.

One reason for the traffic jam is that many more shows than usual are holdover hits from last season and from previous seasons. This has been Broadway's busiest summer, with established shows thriving and new shows opening. Thirteen musicals, two comedies and one drama appear to have the staying power for prolonged runs. Added to them are two hits that are moving this fall from Off Broadway to Broadway: "For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide/When the Rainbow Is Enuf" and "Tuscaloosa's Calling Me."

"It's a new business," says veteran producer Herman Shulman. "I read the grosses very week and I don't remember any season when there was such interest in the theater. It's wonderful—and its weird."

There is less interest in, or perhaps, more trepidation about, expensive musicals, unless the property is a proven success from the past. Last season saw the return of "My Fair Lady" and "Guys and Dolls." This season Zero Mostel will be back with "Fiddler on the Roof," an uncut "Porgy and Bess" will visit the Uris, and there is talk about bringing in traveling companies of "West Side Story" (with Leslie Uggams) and "The King and I" (with Yul Brynner). With "Hellzapoppin" (starring Jerry Lewis), Alexander Cohen hopes to recapture the free spirit, if not the exact material, of Olson and Johnson.

A rare new musical following a traditional route to Broadway is David Merrick's "The Baker's Wife," and keeping with tradition it is undergoing repairs on the road. A New York date has not been set.

For all the enthusiasm, producers are, if anything, more cautious. Richard Adler, who returned to Broadway

Do Authors Mix Fact and Fantasy?

Every season is going to have its own character there's no way of saying what that character might be until it's all over and done. To tell the truth, I don't even like to talk about a season ahead of time. If you think what's announced for production, what's accepted, what the newest vogue or the way prove to be, you wind up looking for what the theater to confirm the conclusion in your head. Which means that, in re-falsifying what you see before you see, prearranged small packages that have to do with the realities at hand. Better, I say, until the curtains come down—and then ever, that there is one strain I'll be looking me to brooding in idle moments for more one I hope the theater will shed some of the months roll by. It's not what you'd yet, but it's teasingly persistent both in forms of literature. I think of it as the drome, though only because I first came Doctorow's novel, "Ragtime." Actually, a topper, had got the jump on Doctorow "Travesties," which was done in London at an its performances here, and the innova- well be thought of as the James Joyce, a syndrome.

Thus, in "Ragtime," Evelyn Nesbit- it, whose jealous husband shot architect death), not to mention Harry Houdini (a appear and reappear casually but influ- es of a made-up family, rather as though las or Sam Houston had turned up to ice the fortunes of Huckleberry Finn (and ik of it, would have seemed more natural). avesties" summoned the real presences of e and the Dadaist enthusiast Tristan Tzara, ves jovially (well, Lenin wasn't very jovial) f a garrulous nobody, equipped with some ends, who'd been created very nearly out fact, the invented nobody was the center- rifiable world-figures his satellites for the ve was less persistent and less perfect here, truly affected any of the fictional lives sim. But the interplay of real and unreal sified by engaging both the refugees from sople created on the spot in the framework- rfectly real play, "The Importance of Being lide's "Earnest" is one of the most artificial item, and here it was being used to embrace re artificial!

The effect was hallucinatory, and it was promptly picked up, or simultaneously arrived at, by writers in less ambitious literary forms, Nicholas Meyer among them. In "The Seven Percent Solution," Mr. Meyer saw to it that the spectacularly fictitious person of Sherlock Holmes, already borrowed from the brain of another creative writer (the mind should begin to reel here), made personal contact with the undeniably actual Sigmund Freud, and in "The West End Horrors" he let Holmes strike up running acquaintance with Bernard Shaw, Frank Harris, Sir Arthur Sullivan and Bram Stoker (author of "Dracula," save the mark). To my mind, Mr. Meyer has been incautious. One writes fresh dialogue for Shaw at one's peril, and each time Shaw spoke in the novel I shuddered, though Shaw wasn't meant to be one of the West End horrors. No matter. The practice is in the air. What does it mean?

I don't know, though I'll hazard a guess in a moment. First we'd best glance at a few of the new form's peculiarities. One of them is that it works best when we know least about the real persons involved. Lenin and James Joyce didn't really assert themselves, very firmly in "Travesties"; Lenin seemed remote and not to belong, the author seemed a bit shy of Joyce's own gift for language. Tristan Tzara, with whose personality and locations we are not very familiar, came off splendidly, tongue loosened by his relative mistiness as a historical presence. Just so in "Ragtime," where Evelyn Nesbit was able to move about with a ready persuasiveness. You see, we don't really know Evelyn Nesbit. We know her name, we know that she provoked, somehow, one of the legendary crimes of the century. But we know her only because of the legend; she is, in fact, very nearly legend herself.

And that, no doubt, is why these near-legendary figures can be so readily mated with the legendary figures of fiction. Sherlock Holmes is a legendary figure of fiction, so powerful a legend that we take him as almost real: the pretense that he is real has spurred countless reincarnations at other hands, has gleefully supported a society devoted to continuing admiration and the further recording of his activities. Take a creature of fiction who is nearly real and a creature of life who is nearly legend and you can put them on the same planet, whatever the name and purpose of that planet may be.

Thus I was dead certain in my heart, as I picked up a copy of Graham Greene's newest play, "The Return of A. J. Raffles," of what I would find. The Raffles of the title is of course the same old gentleman-burglar we've been enjoying all these years (John Barrymore, 1917; Ronald Colman, 1930; and so on into the night), originally the inspiration of one E. W. Hornung. Mr. Greene's play has apparently not been very successful in London; I should think, however, we might enjoy its light-mindedness. Off Broadway one evening, but, having seen that legendary name on the title page, what did I expect as I advanced upon the Cast of Characters? I expected it to include both real and unreal personae. And so it does, so it does. Among the folk our gentleman-burglar tangles with this time around are the Marquess of Queensberry (of the Oscar Wilde case), Lord Alfred Douglas (of the Oscar Wilde case), and the Prince of Wales (of 1907). Whatever strange impulse has been in the air remains in the air.

Why? Why should theater and novel be so eager to match their legends with real-life legends? Why, putting such legendary figures as Sherlock Holmes and Raffles aside, should both forms be so eager to place the known-to-be-real alongside the admittedly imagined, the factual and the fictitious shoulder to shoulder? I said I'd hazard a guess. I think the imaginative arts may be trying to demonstrate, impudently but emphatically, that in its own way fiction can be quite as true as fact.

And why should it want to do that? Because fiction, indeed every one of the imaginative arts, has for so long been downgraded, distrusted, cast aside in favor of the guaranteed-to-be-true, in favor of "reliable" nonfiction. It's no secret that the novel has become a neglected form, on the best-selling charts as elsewhere. Drama as a literary form has not exactly been thriving. A popular historian like William Manchester, in "The Glory and the Dream," first summarizes the situation as of 1964 by quoting Eric Hopkins to the

RICHARD EDER

A Little Anticipation Goes a Long Way

a serious conversation we can't help noticing the odd hat some passer-by is wearing. How many people can resist looking at a lit window, even if it's only to see a man drinking a glass of milk? When the train leaves the tunnel there is a compulsion to look out even if we know it's only the Jersey Meadows. After a while, because it's only the Jersey Meadows, we stop.

The beginning of a movie is exactly like that. Almost anything real the camera shows is compelling, particularly nowadays when directors and cameramen have such skill at setting a scene and a mood. This professional moviegoer can recall all kinds of beginnings of movies that not only had no endings—for all one could remember, or would want to—but no middles either.

Take a nullity like "The Gumball Rally," dealing with the efforts of a variegated band of speed demons to conduct a non-stop car race from New York to California. It begins with one of the most-used movie shots of all time: a panoramic view of Manhattan that gradually zeroes in on one particular office in one particular skyscraper. It is not even particularly well-done, yet the sight of all these familiar buildings continues to please our under-employed eyes, and the very familiarity of the device makes it resemble the "once upon a time" that began so many stories and always aroused hopefulness. Unfortunately "once upon a time" is followed by something about as gripping as reading a week-old newspaper out loud.

"Gator," a movie that deploys considerably more talent to not a great deal more effect, is another example. It starts well and funny, setting up for us a fat, bumbling but persevering federal agent who is sent from New York to break up organized iniquity in a Deep South swamp county. Jack Weston looks perfect as the disaster-prone agent, a would-be city slicker with not an ounce of slickness in him. Sweating, wearing a tight searsucker suit and tiny hat, he stands in a motorboat crashing through the mangrove swamps and makes it look as if he were trying to keep his balance in a mis-directed Seventh Avenue Express. But the movie doesn't aim anywhere in particular—though it has lots of action—and Mr. Weston's talent for clowning and Burt Reynolds' talent for looking kind behind his black mustache all go for very little. Why do these and so many other movies collapse, immediately or after a while? There are many reasons, different in each case, but what is common to almost all of them is a lack of writing. We tend not to think of movies as a written medium, because so many other elements enter. Yet the great European directors either write their films or are intimately involved in their writing. American directors are often less involved.

In any event, when a movie stops breathing it isn't because the camera stops taking nice pictures or the actors give up. It is because the writing, instead of working to explore a character or even just to tell a story, becomes simply a means to make the picture go on, to provide the actors with something to say, to stuff in gags or action, to give the camera something to look at.

Such movies—the vast majority of those that come to New York each month—start with situations: the New York agent in "Gator," the car fanatics in "Gumball Rally"—but nothing is done with them.

There are better specimens where a little is done. A character or two is created and lives for a while. In "The Shootist" John Wayne gets some initial rounding as the old, sick gunman. In "Ode to Billy Joe" the two young lovers have a very particular and individual kind of charm. But then, with the characters possessing the beginnings of life and movement, the writer doesn't know what to do with them or, more properly, what it is they would do if they were as real as they started out to be. John Wayne's character is allowed to trail off in a tangle of unresolved motivation. "Billy Joe" is sabotaged by forcing the two characters into an incredible plot line.

We are left with beginnings. If American lives have no second acts, most recent American movies have no second reels.

In last week's column, discussing examples of good acting, F. Murray Abraham was mentioned for his work in "The Ritz." Unfortunately his name was spelled Abramson. Good acting is not so common that it can afford to be mis-spelled, and we apologize.

A best thing to take into a movie is nothing. A sweater for the air-conditioning; glasses if they are needed for seeing, and possibly dark glasses for looking attentive while asleep.

What is of very little use, and usually harmful, is anticipation. It has ruined any view for people who have gone depending on views, word of mouth or a previous happy something made by the same director or actor. If any attitude is to be carried in past it should be foreboding.

be taken simply as saying that most movies and that it is better to be surprised than dis-true, of course, but I think there's something and pessimism do different things to the what we are seeing, and by and large expect-ly to put a barrier between the screen and gloom.

argued that this is also true of plays and is something passive about the way we see more so than with play-going and infinitely it reading a book. When we advance upon a pursue and try to seize it, it recedes per-stantly or infiltrate or invade us. We do with our senses open, our brain, if possible, it our emotions in neutral. The half-closed ifies a good experience at the movies; the azing over, a bad one.

phenomenon sets up a paradox for movie rain it a little way: it could be that the best ne for a good movie would be to write dis- it, thus putting prospective spectators into frame of mind to appreciate it. The trouble, they might not go.

static reviews given to "Nashville" and to "Love and Death" contributed to the letdown uated and enthusiastic filmgoers felt when n't suggest that this was the main factor—t Berkeleyan enough to hold that the only is the viewer's frame of mind—but it ore recently, and more trivially, I'm afraid t the immoderate laughter induced in me by ay have contributed to the immoderate an- number of people who went to see it after w.

that the political urgency which distinguished "All the President's Men" will spark a trend toward exposés of corruption in high places. In today's go-for-broke market, producers prefer gambling on carbon copies of past hits and on the sort of mammoth, mindless shock-and-gimmick stories viewers cannot tune into on television.

And since "The Omen" and the revival of "The Exorcist" are among the current season's box-office leaders, moviegoers will scarcely be shocked to discover they are in for a spate of satanic chilers in the coming months, as well as a number of fright shows dealing with reincarnation and miscellaneous supernatural mysteries. In Michael Winner's "The Sentinel," Cristina Raines will struggle to evict evil spirits from her Manhattan brownstone; in Robert Wise's "Audrey Rose," Marsha Mason will be startled to find that her little girl is the reincarnated spirit of Anthony Hopkins's dead daughter; in Dan Curtis's "Burnt Offerings," Karen Black and Bette Davis will rapidly wrinkle and wither as the run-down house they live in miraculously repairs itself; in "The Car," a vicious, possibly unmanned vehicle will menace the confused citizenry of a small town.

It would be unfair to pre- judge the quality of these films; each and every one of them may succeed in the argu- ably valid aim of raising goosebumps. Yet it is disturb- ing that director Brian De Palma, who has shown prom- ise in such films as "Greet- ings" and "Obsession," can find no more challenging directorial task than "Carrie," the upcoming thrill- er in which Sissy Spacek, a maladjusted teen-ager, uses her telekinetic powers to call down a fiery storm upon her helpless neighbors. One also regrets that John Boorman, the imaginative director of "Deliverance," has been re- duced to supervising Linda Blair's latest skirmishes with Old Scratch in "Exorcist II: The Heretic."

"Exorcist II" is by no means the only sequel about to unravel on the screen. Although "Jaws II," with Roy Scheider repeating his role of Police Chief Brady, may not be in shape until very late in 1977 or early in 1978, we will have the Christmas treat this year of seeing Clint East- wood play the dashingly sad- istic Dirty Harry—for the third time—in "The Enforc- er." Bo Swenson will be back again as Buford Pusser, tak- ing the law into his own hands in "Walking Tall III— The Final Chapter"; Peter Sellers will do his Inspector Clouseau shtick—conceiv- ably in his sleep—in "The Pink Panther Strikes Again"; Jack Lemmon, James Stewart and Olivia de Havilland will be fastening their seat belts for a bumpy ride into the Bermuda Triangle in "Airport 1977"; Sidney Poitier and Bill Cosby will kid the cops-and-robbers genre in a sequel to "Let's Do It Again," which was itself a sequel to "Up- town Saturday Night." Last—and quite likely least—Tom Laughlin will stride through "Billy Jack Goes to Washington," which is not only a sequel to three other Billy Jack movies, but a remake of "Mister Smith Goes to Washington," as well.

Speaking of remakes, two of the year's most relentless- ly hyped films will be arriv- ing during the prestigious, lucrative Christmas week. In "A Star Is Born," a rock-sing- ing Barbra Streisand will in- vite comparisons with the formidable memory of Judy Garland, while Kris Kristoff- erson will sing and stagger his way through the role of the alcoholic husband played by James Mason in the 1954 musical remake of the 1937 Janet Gaynor-Fredric March drama. In "King Kong," fash- ion model Jessica Lange will follow in the footsteps—and frenzied shrieks—of Fay Wray, while Jeff Bridges has been handed the less awe- some chore of out-classing Bruce Cabot.

Although both "King Kong" and "A Star Is Born" have been updated and plopped down into contemporary surroundings, a disproportionately high percentage of up- coming American films are set in the past, a reflection of the industry's reluctance to deal with the painful, and therefore financially risky, realities of today. That is not to say, however, that an oc- casional cinematic trip back- ward in time may not be exe- cuted with wit and per- ception, and perhaps some subtle message for the inhab- itants of here and now.

"The Last Tycoon," for ex- ample, promises to be emi- nently rewarding. Harold Pinter's adaptation of F. Scott Fitzgerald's unfinished novel about Hollywood has been directed by Ella Kazan, stars Robert De Niro as an idealistic producer patterned after the late Irving Thalberg, and features Jack Nicholson, Robert Mitchum, Jeanne Mo- reau, Tony Curtis and British newcomer Ingrid Boulting. A lighter look at bygone Holly- wood days will be offered by director Peter Bogdanovich in "Nickelodeon," with Ryan O'Neal, Burt Reynolds and tiny Tatum O'Neal.

Tiny Jodie Foster—so per- suasive as the adolescent prostitute in "Taxi Driver"— plays a torch singer named Tallulah in "Bugsy Malone," a stylized Prohibition-era gangster musical which excited the Cannes Festival crowd and could well turn out to be a sleeper when it opens here next month. "A Matter of Time," directed by Vin- cente Minnelli and starring Liza Minnelli and Ingrid Bergman, is set in 1946, and Miss Minnelli will also be seen as a 40's band singer who croons a love tune or two to saxophonist Robert De Niro in Martin Scorsese's "New York, New York." Bal- let star Rudolf Nureyev will prove that he can tango—and perhaps act—in Ken Russell's "Valentino."

Another charismatic enter- tainer from the American past, folk singer Woody Guthrie, will be portrayed by David Carradine, and it's said that "Bound for Glory"—the first film to be directed by Hal Ashby since "Shampoo"—will stress Guthrie's polit- ical, as well as musical, ac- complishments.

American politics, at their most unpleasant, will also figure prominently in Martin Ritt's "The Front," a drama about the blacklisting era in which neither Woody Allen nor Zero Mostel plays it for laughs. Nicol Williamson and Alan Arkin do play it for laughs—or at least smiles—as Sherlock Holmes and Sig- mund Freud in Herbert Ross's "The Seven-Percent Solu- tion."

When moviemakers grow weary of pillaging the past, there is always the future to be tapped. "Close Encounters of the Third Kind," directed by Steven Spielberg and starring Richard Dreyfuss and François Truffaut, takes place in that time when citi- zens from another planet finally decide to pay us a visit. George Lucas, who probed our collective past in "American Graffiti," will give us a future shock in "Star Wars," with Alec Guinness and Carrie Fisher, daughter of Debbie Reynolds. A futur- istic Julie Christie will be im- pregnated by an impudent computer in Donald Cammel's "Demon Seed"; Dominique Sanda, the last woman alive after a nuclear holocaust, has her pick between Jan-Michael Vincent and George Peppard in Jack Smight's "Damnation Alley."

Broadway Will Be Booming

Chelsea, which gave "Yent!" to Broadway last year, will follow "The Prince of Homburg" with "Counting the Way" and "Listening," two one-act chamber plays by Edward Albee, directed by the author; Stanislaw Ignacy Witkiewicz's "The Crazy Locomotive," which will take the audience for a ride on a runaway locomotive, and probably a sing-along musical version of "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines" by Arnold Weinstein and Robert Kalfin.

The Long Wharf in New Haven, which nurtured "Streamers" last year, this season will present the world premiere of a new play by Arthur Miller, "The Archbishop's Ceiling," about art and politics in an Iron Curtain country, directed by Arvin Brown. The Long Wharf will also offer "Alphabetical Order" by a British playwright, Michael Frayn, and "The Shadow Box" by a new American playwright, Michael Cristofer.

At Henry Street, Woodie King, Jr., who first presented "Colored Girls," is planning a full season of new plays by Richard Wesley, Edgar White, Charles Fuller and Ed Bullins, as well as a rare revival of Orson Welles's Haitian version of "Macbeth," first staged by the Federal Theater in 1936.

The Circle Repertory Theater will follow David Storey's "The Farm" with Arthur Whitney's "Passion of Lill Lamont," guest-starring Leueen MacGrath, Julie Bovasso's "Angelo's Wedding" and Corinne Jacker's "My Life."

The Manhattan Theater Club will open its season with a new American play, "Children" by A. R. Gurney Jr., and a new British play, either one by Howard Brenton or one by Howard Barker.

As one sign of the turn toward developmental work, the Phoenix Theater is switching from classics on Broadway to new plays Off Broadway (and in so doing cutting its costs in half). In a new "second step program" at Marymount Manhattan College on East 71st Street, the Phoenix will produce seven new plays, ones that have been in theatrical laboratories, such as the Eugene O'Neill Playwrights Conference. The plays will include "Lady House Blues" by Kevin O'Morrison, "Marco Polo" by Jonathan Levy and "The Reason We Eat" (about a $1,000-a-week fat farm) by Israel Horowitz.

The American Place Theater is beginning its season with plays that have progressed through a workshop phase: "Jack Geber's New Play: Rehearsal," which is about theater, prison and corruption, and "Domino Courts" and "Comanche Cafe," two one-acts by William Hauptman.

A $5 Million Pebble, A Mahler Festival And Operas Galore

Metropolitan Opera's musical affairs for some time, begins his first season with the title of music director. The big nights at the Met promise, as always, to be the premieres, of which there are six this season. Three of the works are new to the Met, including Berg's "Lulu," which has never been done by any New York company. Mr. Levine conducts "Lulu," with Teresa Stratas in the title role. Poulenc's "Dialogues des Carmélites" will offer a cast including Régine Crespin and Shirley Verrett. Massenet's "Esclarmonde" brings Joan Sutherland, in a production borrowed from the San Francisco Opera. Hardly new, but unperformed at the Met since 1928 is Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète," a once-popular showpiece for vocal heroes (the Met cast has Marilyn Horne, Renata Scott and James McCracken). There also will be new productions of more familiar works: "Lohengrin" with René Kollo as the knightly tenor, and "La Bohème" with Renata Scott and Luciano Pavarotti paired as bohemian lovers. The Met's season opener on Oct. 11 is one for the vocal fans to note: it brings on Miss Scott and Mr. Pavarotti along with Shirley Verrett and Cornell MacNeil in "Il Trovatore."

The Met, of course, continues to stagger under financial troubles, but because of the lead-time required in producing any opera season, the seriousness of the situation should not be apparent to outsiders this season. For now, the Met appears to be doing business as usual, with the usual roster of big-name singers.

Over at the City Opera, Julius Rudel will be celebrating his 20th year as music director by offering seven new productions, including the world premiere of Leon Kirchner's "Lily." This is a work based on Saul Bellow's "Henderson the Rain King" that Mr. Kirchner has been laboring to finish since 1959 when it was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. "Lily" will be staged by Tom O'Horgan, the "Hair" and "Jesus Christ Superstar" director, so expect something unusual, at least. Another controversial City Opera director, Frank Corsaro, will be staging a triple bill consisting of Poulenc's "La Voix Humaine," Mozart's "The Impresario" and Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat." Hard-shell opera traditionalists are likely to be enraged, but Mr. Rudel and his Broadway-trained directors must be used to that by this time. Of special interest to feminists and lovers of offbeat musical theater is the debut, at long last, of Sarah Caldwell in the double role of conductor and director. The impresaria of the Boston Opera has conducted at the Met and she has directed at the City Opera, but this season offers her the chance to control a whole production for the first time in New York. The opera is "The Barber of Seville," with Beverly Sills as Rosina and Alan Tinius as Figaro.

Menotti's "The Saint of Bleeker Street" comes back to the City Opera for the first time since 1965, with the promising young soprano Catherine Malfitano as Antonia. "Der Fliegende Holländer," sung in German, promises to be another highlight.

Mr. Rudel kicks up his heels in his 20th season by conducting the new production of Offenbach's "La Belle Hélène," a bit of frivolity not heretofore indulged in by the company. Note also the return of "Louise," with Beverly Sills, and the first City Opera production since 1968 of "The Pirates of Penzance."

That's what's doing in home-bred opera. Visiting companies will be making a splash, too. The Paris Opéra arrives on Sept. 8 for a two-week stay at the Metropolitan Opera House, bringing heavyweight casts that include such names as Margareta Price, Nicola Gedda, Mirella Freni, Roger Soyer, Carlo Cossutta, Gabriel Bacquier and Frederica von Stade. Sir Georg Solti, the company's musical advisor, will conduct "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Otello" and a French newcomer, Michel Plasson, will lead "Faust."

La Scala, the operatic pride of Italy, will be putting on a two-week season at the Kennedy Center in Washington, but its only stop in New York will be non-operatic: a performance of Verdi's Requiem at Carnegie. This is getting to be a habit of La Scala's. In 1967, when the Milan company was heading home from Expo 67 in Montreal, it stopped off at Carnegie and did the Verdi Requiem under Herbert von Karajan. This kind of hit-and-run nonoperatic program is simply trading on a brand name and cannot present even the haziest picture of the great La Scala.

Opera will be with us in concert form at Carnegie when the Boston Symphony presents "Eugene Onegin," under Seiji Ozawa, with Galina Vishnevskaya as Tatiana. In some quarters this is perceived as Boston's bid to play the opera-in-concert game that has proved so successful at Carnegie for Sir Georg Solti and his Chicago Symphony. Oddy, the Chicago is bypassing opera this trip, concentrating in its six Carnegie concerts largely on the standard concert repertoire.

The absence of Sol Hurok from the scene and the struggle to keep his artist-management empire from breaking apart will continue to figure in the shaping of the musical picture. The late impresario's flamboyance is missed, but also and more significantly his daring, shrewdness and imagination. Several would-be Huroks have been competing to inherit his list of artists and at least one big-name performer, Andrés Segovia, has been announced as being under the management of both the Hurok organization and a competitor. This backstage infighting should not seriously affect audiences, however; they will continue to be offered the same major artists as before. So far, in any event, the tangible results of the struggle have been negligible.

The Paris Opéra engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House, which in the past was Sol Hurok's unchallengeable turf through an understanding with the Met management, indicates that the Hurok style of chance-taking may not be extinct. The Paris Opéra is being presented by Hurok Attractions, Inc., perhaps to prove that the financial disaster suffered in last season's Bolshoi Opera visit was a mere aberration, not a clue to the future of one of the world's great artist-management organizations. With Sir Georg Solti leading the Paris Opéra on its New York foray and with the repertory consisting of three standard works, it is hard to see how the engagement could fail at the box-office, but that remains to be proved.

The season also promises interesting comings and goings, anniversaries and new-music premieres. Pierre Boulez goes out as the Philharmonic's music director with a season that includes the New York premiere of one of his own works, "Rituel," and either New York or world premieres of pieces by John Cage, Toru Takemitsu, George Crumb, Elliott Carter, David Del and Leslie Bassett. Mr. Boulez's farewell will be Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" on May 14. Meanwhile, Zubin Mehta, the man who will replace Mr. Boulez as music director (after a one-season hiatus during which guests will conduct the Philharmonic), will be hanging around in the wings. Mr. Mehta conducts the Israel Philharmonic at Brooklyn College on Sept. 11, and on March 25 will lead his current orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, at Carnegie in Mahler's Symphony No. 3. Interestingly, it is also the Mahler Third that Mr. Boulez will conduct on Oct. 21 at the first subscription concert in the remodeled Avery Fisher Hall. Comparisons will be inevitable.

Anniversaries and other red-letter days abound. The Juilliard String Quartet enters its 30th season and so does its leader and first violinist, Robert Mann, who is the only original member left in the group. Mstislav Rostropovich's 50th birthday will be marked by a National Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall at which Mr. Rostropovich, the orchestra's new music director, will conduct and play the cello. Fifty is a bit early to begin celebratory concerts for anyone, but an excuse to hear Mr. Rostropovich should always be taken. A more likely number to celebrate, 80, is being noted by admirers of Virgil Thomson, whose Symphony No. 3 will be given its world premiere by the American Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie.

Compensation is one of nature's laws, and this year we have two splendid examples in the Mostly Mozart Festival and the Mahler Festival. When Mostly Mozart had to leave Avery Fisher Hall this summer it was fortunate enough to land in Alice Tully Hall, a far more congenial place for its programs. So too with the New York Philharmonic's Mahler Festival, which will be accommodated handsomely, no doubt, next month at Carnegie Hall while Avery Fisher Hall is in the throes of being born again, acoustically speaking. The festival will run a month, on

HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

Two Weeks of Operatic Excitement

Goussier Piermarini was engaged to design a great new theater in a different location. He got permission to raze two buildings—the church of Santa Maria della Scala and the Scuole Cannobbiane. Two new buildings resulted—the Teatro alla Scala, which is considered Piermarini's masterpiece, and the smaller Teatro della Cannobbiane.

Piermarini took about two years to build La Scala. It was opened on Aug. 3, 1778, with a performance of Antonio Salieri's "L'Europa riconosciuta." Salieri, who had his headquarters in Vienna, was Mozart's big rival. His music is all but forgotten today. What a feather in Scala's cap it would have been had it commissioned an opera from the problematic Mozart rather than the easy-to-assimilate Salieri! But that was not to be.

From its opening day, La Scala held and has maintained its position as one of the most handsome houses in Europe. Inside, it looks big—much bigger than it actually is. The six tiers, with recessed boxes, have many believing that the auditorium is as big as the Metropolitan Opera. In reality, La Scala can seat no more than 2,269 (as against some 3,700 at the Metropolitan), and many of those seats are bad. The traditional horseshoe shape of La Scala means that many seats give only a partial view of the stage. The effective seating capacity of La Scala really is only around 2,000.

Naturally the house went through changes. The basic structure retained its integrity, but in 1830 the interior décor was changed to reflect a neoclassical style. In 1860 gas lighting was installed, and in 1883 electric lights. La Scala was the first theater in the world to make use of Edison's new-fangled invention. World War II was not kind to La Scala. On the night of Aug. 16, 1943, a bombing raid reduced the famous opera house to rubble. After the war it seemed to be Priority No. 1 on the Italian list to put La Scala together again. It took less than a year. On May 11, 1946, Arturo Toscanini rededicated La Scala, which had carefully been rebuilt according to the original building plans.

If in 1778 La Scala did not take advantage of the operas of the world's greatest composer, it later made up for it by concentrating on Italy's four 19th-century giants—Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini and Verdi. Later, of course, there were Puccini and the others. It was at the Scala that Verdi's first opera, "Oberto," was given in 1839. An incredible 52 years later saw La Scala presenting the world premiere of Verdi's last opera, "Falstaff." In between, La Scala presented seven other Verdi operas for the first time.

Standards at La Scala always were high. The finest of the world's singers and conductors worked there. As Guglielmo Barblan in Grove's Dictionary puts it, "Ever since Stendhal, authors and critics have been unable to dispute the fact that no opera, no singer and no conductor can be sure of an international reputation without having passed the test of a success at the Scala. . . . It may be asserted that the operatic activities of the 19th century revolved around the Scala, and the schools of scenic designs, of dance and of singing which developed in association with the theater also came to enjoy artistic fame." All of which is true, though it should be pointed out that the Paris Opéra from about 1830 to 1870, with its lavish stagings of the Meyerbeer operas and its supercolossal effects, was the dominant scenic force of the era.

Acoustically La Scala is one of the most successful opera houses in the world. That does not prevent singers from jockeying for position on stage. It is an article of belief among international singers that there is one spot on the Scala stage that is more flattering to the voice than anywhere else. So, in a duet, say, two ample bodies try to defy natural law by occupying the same volume of space. Soprano and tenor elbow each other to land on the spot. This may play havoc with the stage action, but those who know what is going on are vastly amused.

The Scala acoustics are good, it has been pointed out (notably by Leo Beranek in his "Music, Acoustics and Architecture"), only for those listeners actually out in the open. Those in the rear of the boxes—and that would include a sizable number of the audience—might just as well stay home and listen to a broadcast. But from the stage and within the actual hall, says Beranek in a conclusion that any experienced listener would endorse, "the sound is clear, warm and brilliant. The foreground is large enough to reflect energy into the hall from the singers' voices which otherwise would be lost in the pit."

Next week: some remarks about the Paris Opéra.

Superstars and Varied Repertory On New Disks

By PETER G. DAVIS

Was it only a few years ago that the doom-sayers were predicting the quiet demise of classical records? No one could make a profit on the things, we were told, the market was shrinking, rock was taking over. Those were the days of the "classical crisis" — cost-cutting programs, a lackadaisical approach to artist-and-repertory planning and the specter of a greatly reduced selection for the record year.

Not so today. RCA is purring over the fact that for the first six months of 1976 its domestic sales of classical records increased 74 percent over the same period in 1975. Philips points proudly to its classical line which now shows a higher profit margin than the pop catalogue of its parent company, Mercury, while London Records reports much the same situation. The result of all this prosperity is an upsurge of activity reflected in the unusual column of new releases scheduled for the coming fall and winter months.

In addition to sheer quantity, there is a good chance that many of these new disks might even turn out to be valuable additions to the recorded repertory. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for example, a standard item that has been recorded dozens of times, can make a fresh impact with the right artist. Collectors are eagerly awaiting a new version led by Carlos Kleiber, due shortly from Deutsche Grammophon.

Another album of the complete Beethoven symphonies had better offer something very unusual these days to compete against the 17 integral editions currently in the catalogue. DG apparently has recognized the problem, for its new set of the Beethoven nine conducted by Rafael Kubelick is rather special: each symphony is played by a different orchestra, all of them major ensembles spread over a geographical span of seven countries. How the Czech-born Kubelick will communicate his view of Beethoven to orchestras in Germany, Austria, Holland, Israel, France, England and the United States should provide an interesting touchstone for today's jet-age conductors.

A star-studded recording of a complete opera has always been a sure-fire means to create the kind of excitement that record collectors crave, and there will be plenty of activity in this department. The big news here is Columbia's re-entry into a field it has cultivated only sporadically over the years and at that with scant success. Columbia's few opera sets from the past decade include "Wozzeck" and "Pelleas" conducted by Boulez, and "Falstaff" and "Der Rosenkavalier" conducted by Bernstein, wonderful recordings but commercial disappointments. Promoting opera sets the course of the 1976-77 music season is going to eclipse in excitement two weeks. At best, visiting opera houses are a scarce commodity. Think of it! But the impossible has happened. The major opera companies in the multicontinent visit to the United States.

is a specialized art and Columbia never seemed to catch the knack; the psychological quirks of record collectors may also have something to do with it, too—had those four recordings appeared on a label with stronger operatic associations, London or RCA for example, they probably would have fared better. It will be interesting to see if Columbia can break the jinx this year—no less than 11 complete operas will be on the way from this quarter.

Columbia's operatic list is heavily weighted in favor of the French repertory, coinciding with the Metropolitan's accent on Gallic opera during the coming season. Massenet will be especially favored by recordings of his "Esclarmonde" with Joan Sutherland (London), "Le Cid" with Grace Bumbry and Placido Domingo (Columbia) and "Thais" with Beverly Sills and Sherrill Milnes (Angel). Francophiles may also expect Charpentier's "Louise," Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète" and Offenbach's "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein" from Columbia, as well as "Carmen" and "La Favorite" from London. Although not a French opera, Wagner's youthful "Rienzi" is patterned after the Parisian grand opera style of Meyerbeer and this important transitional work to the composer's mature style will shortly appear on Angel.

Wagnerians may also look forward to two "Meistersingers," one from London conducted by Solti, the other on DG led by Jochum, while London also has taped a

"Dutchman" with Solti and the Chicago Symphony, Aside from "Carmen," RCA's new "La Forza del Destino" (Leontyne Price, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes) is the sole bread-and-butter item in a list of seldom-performed works that include Leoni's "L'Oracolo" (London), Donizetti's "Gemma di Vergy" (Columbia), Delius's "Fennimore and Gerda" (Angel), Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnot" (Columbia), Shostakovich's "The Nose" (Columbia), and, from Philips, Haydn's "La Vera Costanza" and "Orlando Paladino," Mozart's "Zaide" and "Lo Sposo Deluso" and Rossini's "Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra." It should be a feast for opera lovers on the lookout for something different. Superstars generate their own electricity no matter what they record and there are never enough of these magnetic names to go around. Columbia has certainly planned the glamour album of the year with its two-record set of last May's Carnegie Hall 85th birthday gala—Horowitz, Rostropovich, Stern and Fischer-Dieskau headline the performers. The same label has lost no time in putting its new star pianist to work: Lazar Berman, the Russian virtuoso who so impressed critics in his U.S. debut last season, will be heard on a disk of two Beethoven sonatas (Nos. 18 and 23), the Schumann sonatas, the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto and a collection of early recordings made several years ago in Russia. Over at RCA the first new recordings in 13 years on that label by Vladimir Horowitz are in the works, culled from his live concerts last season. James Levine continues his Mahler series with the Third Symphony, while RCA's eternal superstar conductor, Toscanini, returns in a collection of never-before-released recordings made with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the early '40's. In addition to his operatic work, New York's favorite non-resident conductor, Georg Solti, will lead performances of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and a coupling of Elgar's "Enigma" Variations and Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra. The indefatigable Leopold Stokowski continues his late Indian summer recording career in England (the conductor has just signed a six-year contract with Columbia which will expire on his 100th birthday). New Stokowski disks are the Beethoven Seventh Symphony (London), Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and Wagner excerpts (RCA), plus a rerelease of his pioneering pre-war recording of Schoenberg's massive "Gurrelieder." Another means of tantalizing jaded classical music palates is recording out-of-the-way repertory. These are works designed to appeal to specialized tastes perhaps, but evidently there are people out there waiting to sample such esoterica as the six Cherubini quartets (Archiv), the complete orchestral works of Carl Ruggles (Columbia), all of Liszt's music for violin and piano (Orion), and a record devoted to chamber pieces by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (Genesis). Several years ago it was considered a bit of whimsy to predict that Fischer-Dieskau, surely the most-recorded singer in the history of the phonograph, might some day even get around to the songs weekends only, with Pierre Boulez, Erich Leinsdorf and James Levine conducting a complete cycle of Mahler symphonies.

There is even compensation of a mild sort for the disappearance, at least for the season, of the Hunter College concerts. The city's budget trouble put the Hunter Arts Concert Bureau out of operation after 33 years, thereby eliminating one of the major platforms in the city for recitals and concerts. The balm is that the handsomely remodeled Kaufman Hall at the 92d Street YM-YWHA has been increasingly successful at presenting major attractions to the East Side audience.

Long, successful runs include the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center, which opens its eighth season with Pierre Boulez conducting Ravel, Debussy and Schoenberg. There will be new pieces by Stanley Silverman, Harrison Birtwistle, Fred Lerdahl and Betsy Jolas. Isaac Stern and Friends is a series to note at Carnegie, as are the Guarneri String Quartet and Friends at Alice Tully and Anthony Newman and Friends, also at Tully. Newell Jenkins and Friends is another group that recently proclaimed its companionship. Isn't it about time someone thought up another name for such amiable ensembles?

The jeweled pivot points of any music season are the internationally worshipped virtuosos, and this season has its fair share. The Soviet pianist Lazar Berman is back for the second season, this time at Carnegie for two recitals, and at the 92d Street Y for one. Rudolf Serkin will be giving only one recital, at Carnegie. Alicia de Larrocha opens the Great Performers series at Avery Fisher, gives a recital at the Y and appears as soloist with the Toronto Symphony at Carnegie. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau gives two Carnegie recitals. Alfred Brendel plays three all-Beethoven programs, also at Carnegie. Daniel Barenboim and Itzhak Perlman appear there with the Orchestre de Paris in the International Festival of Visiting Orchestras, as does Bernard Haitink with the London Philharmonic. Ruth Laredo is piano soloist at Carnegie when the American Symphony Orchestra opens its season on Oct. 10. Claudio Arrau plays a benefit recital for the 92d Street Y on March 7.

But these are the sure, or almost sure, things. It would not do to overlook the season's chancier events, such as Peter Schickèle's threat to present, at the 92d Street Y, "the world's only cowboy opera for brass quintet." And would any Beethoven lover not want to be warned that Galina Vaszonyi will play all 32 piano sonatas in two marathon programs (Oct. 24 and 31), each lasting 12 hours. Mr. Vaszonyi proposes to perform the sonatas chronologically, starting at 11 A.M. and ending at 11 P.M. each day with six intermissions.

The most exciting performance of the season, however, will be the dropping of that $5 million pebble by Cyril Harris. We must hope it is a pebble, at any rate, and not just another Lincoln Center lemon.

The Volatile Pop Field's Bubbling

By MICHAEL KAPLAN

Looking ahead to the pop concert season, all one can say about the winter and spring is that most of the major artists are likely to tour this way again. Elton John has given broad hints that he may "retire" for a while, while Carly Simon is thinking seriously about taking to the road. The Rolling Stones are making noises about coming here after their aborted summer tour; the Who seem to be actively concertizing again; and Led Zeppelin should be back on the road after their hiatus. It's hard, of course, to imagine a full season now without Bob Dylan, and John Denver never stops touring—or so it seems.

But that's all speculative. Speaking closer to the present, one first notices the curious reversal on the New York promotion front. Season before last, Howard Stein was New York's leading promoter, with Ron Delsener comfortably ensconced in the number two slot. Then suddenly last season, Mr. Stein suffered a dramatic reversal of his fortunes and, in effect, disappeared from the local concert scene. The Academy of Music on 14th Street, long his principal bastion, was the site of very few concerts last season, and the 3,000-seat market was more or less monopolized by Mr. Delsener in the more attractive Beacon Theater on Broadway at 74th Street.

Now it turns out that Mr. Delsener and the owners of the Beacon have parted company, and that Mr. Delsener is transferring his fare to the Academy. The Beacon will house concerts sponsored by its owners, most often in conjunction with Concerts East, a Long Island-based promotion company, which has merged its activities in New York with Mr. Stein.

Mr. Delsener, who promises a $50,000 refurbishment of the tacky Academy, will open there on Sept. 18 and 19 with the Band, perhaps the most respected of all North American rock groups. Other acts booked into the Academy this fall include Jackson Browne, Jeff Beck, Todd Rundgren and Billy Joel.

Mr. Delsener's activities are hardly limited to the Academy, however. Peter Frampton, currently the golden boy of the album charts, will be at the Garden Oct. 8, 9 and 10, and the Doobie Brothers, the Beach Boys and Chicago are all set for the Garden and/or Nassau Coliseum this fall.

Mr. Stein and his partners will offer the new Richie Furay band at the Beacon on Sept. 17, with acts like Cheech and Chong, Gato Barbieri, Dr. Hook, Billy Cobham and Firefall due there later on. Mr. Stein also speaks of Garden presentations of Emerson, Lake and Palmer and Black Sabbath in the winter and spring.

In addition, the Beacon owners or independent promoters will present a variety of other events at the Academy, including a number of Latin music concerts. The New York Philharmonic and Lincoln Center hold a 10-week option on the Beacon beginning in mid-October, should the new Avery Fisher Hall not be completed on time. If the option is exercised, there will still be some pop concerts on off days. At the moment, however, it looks as if construction at Lincoln Center is on schedule—which, in turn, means that the Great (pop) Performers series in Fisher Hall will continued as in previous years. So far, artists booked there include Kris Kristofferson, Gordon Lightfoot, Harry Chapin, Leo Kottke (in Alice Tully Hall), David Bromberg and Neil Sedaka.

There are other promoters in town, of course, and most of them are involved with Latin and black acts. If the Radio City Music Hall labor dispute is settled satisfactorily, that hall will probably play host to an increasing number of concerts, as will the Garden and the West Forum. Most of the major black and live disco acts are suburbs. So far, the principal outlying rock palaces—the Capitol in Passaic, N.J., and the Calderone on Long Island, can be expected to attract the same touring bands that appear at the Academy and the Beacon. And middle-of-the-road venues like the Westchester Premier Theater in Tarrytown and the Westbury Music Fair on the Island will continue to lure an older pop crowd for acts like Frank Sinatra, Shirley Bassey and Tom Jones.

Clubs and cabarets (cabarets tend to be a separate circuit, but often overlap into youth-oriented pop) fluctuate with fashion as mercurially as the music itself. At the moment the Bottom Line remains the leading rock club in town, followed by the Other End and My Father's Place in Roslyn, L.I.

On the underground circuit CBGB's and Max's Kansas City are still the leaders, although Mickey Ruskin's Lower Manhattan Ocean Club is threatening to steal some of their thunder. Discos—not strictly places for live entertainment, although some of them do offer periodic concerts—remain a teeming phenomenon here, for all the hopeful talk of the death of disco by unregenerate rockers.

The most interesting potential development on the rock-pop club scene involves Mr. Stein's efforts to obtain the Belasco Theater from the Shubert organization. Mr. Stein wants to use the West 44th Street house, whose orchestra seats were removed for cabaret seating for the short-lived "Rocky Horror Show," as a showplace for "hip middle-of-the-road acts" like Manhattan Transfer, Neil Sedaka and soft rockers.

Most of the record companies can't predict their major releases beyond Christmas, but there are some exceptions. Atlantic hopes for a live Led Zeppelin album in October and a Bad Company disk "before Christmas." Other disks in preparation for this season include releases by the Rolling Stones, Emerson, Lake and Palmer, Roberta Flack, Bette Midler and Yes.

Warner Brothers will be marketing new efforts by Fleetwood Mac, Funkadelic, Ry Cooder, Stephen Stills and Neil Young, Gary Wright, Black Sabbath, Frank Zappa (title: "Zoot Allures"), and the Allman Brothers (a live album), plus the reissued Phil Spector Christmas album and a Spector's greatest production hits disk, and "Best-ofs" by the Faces, the Doobie Brothers, James Taylor, Jimi Hendrix (Vol. 2) and Mr. Young. Also promised for the more distant future are a live Jimmy Cliff album and records by Randy Newman, Emmylou Harris, Bonnie Raitt, Dionne Warwick and the McGarrigle sisters.

Motown has a busy fall release schedule, with not only the long-delayed Wonder album but disks by Eddie Kendricks, the Miracles, Smokey Robinson, the Jackson 5 (new studio material recorded before they switched to Epic), the Supremes and a Marvin Gaye greatest-hits package.

From MCA will be new records by Olivia Newton-John, Elton John and Loretta Lynn, plus "Evita," the new rock opera about Eva Peron by the creators of "Jesus Christ, Superstar." Elektra Asylum promises disks by Jackson Browne, the Eagles, Tom Waits, Joni Mitchell, Queen and New York's own Television. Capitol offers Be-Bop Deluxe, the Band and, someday, a new Paul McCartney and Wings record.

From RCA we can expect records by Dolly Parton, David Bowie, Silver Convention and the Starland Vocal Band, plus a Lon Read's greatest hits record and a two-record "Porgy and Bess" album by Ray Charles and Cleo Laine. And Arista will have a new album by Mr. Read, as well as records by Patti Smith, Melissa Manchester and the Kinks.

Columbia has a disk called "Loretta Haggars" by Mary Kay Place of "Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman" on tap, as well as new material by Bob Dylan and Laura Nyro (not live tour albums). There are also records by Willie Nelson, Loggins and Messina, Pink Floyd, Chicago, Johnny Taylor and Theodore Pendergrass in the works.

What all this amounts to is the prospect of another bubbling year in local and national popular music. If one could predict trends with precision, one would be a millionaire: there are a lot of nervous record executives trying right now to do just that.

Who knows, for instance, whether at this time next year reggae will be huge or forgotten? What about the slugging between rock and disco on the charts and on the suburban club circuit? Will Latin music spread beyond a specialist market? Has the underground New York rock scene already crested, or will the best bands find a national audience? Will cabaret acts and nostalgic soft-rockers continue to find listeners among rock-pop fans? Have we seen the last of jazz-rock, or does Jeff Beck's "Wired" herald a new wave of rock-jazz? Will teen heavy-metal bands like Kiss and Aerosmith find new ways to proclaim their trivial decadence?

What is undeniable is that pop has lost the world-redeeming qualities that some thought it had in the mid-late sixties. Today's scene is a more stylistically diverse affair, one in which artists appeal to specialized audiences on the basis of their music or their personalities, not as harbingers of a new age.

The new season isn't likely to alter that; it will take another convulsion in the nation as a whole to transform the wider meaning of music. In the meantime, entertainment rules the airwaves, the record stores and our pop concert halls, and it takes an individual artist reaching out to the individual listener to say something more profound.

Cabaret and Jazz Are Active, But...

non; Andrea Marcovicci, and a return engagement of "Cathy Chamberlain's Rag 'n' Roll Revue."

Meanwhile, both Brothers and Sisters, 355 W. 48th St., and the Grand Finale, 210 W. 70th St., are in the process of being sold. Because of the prospective sale, David Vanyan of Brothers and Sisters has made no bookings beyond Labor Day (Barbara Cook is playing this week) although he has been talking to Julie Wilson, Larry Kert and Karen Morrow about fall engagements.

"Cabaret is not a valid financial form in New York," Vanyan recently said in explaining his desire to sell. "Brothers and Sisters makes money, but the idea that we're doing well is a myth created by us and the media. At first, our audience was primarily homosexual. Then they left, and we failed to build another audience. And there's the matter of fear—fear of going out at night. Until a year ago, our second show was our busiest. Now we can't fill the 11:30 show even with our best acts."

Although Harry Endicott of the Grand Finale thinks that cabaret "is a limited future and wants to get back to the theater," to producing, he is lining up a season studded with bigger names than the club has had in the past—Charles Pierce, the critically acclaimed impressionist, from Sept. 21 to Oct. 3; Tessie O'Shea, the star of "Something's Afoot," from Oct. 5 to Oct. 18; and the possibility of Peter Gennaro and Yvonne de Carlo later in the season.

"Once the economy settles down," Endicott points out, "the big rooms, which closed because of the strike of the economy, will open up again.

I hope they will have learned something from the small rooms. And if they have, they'll push the small rooms out of business."

Despite such doom-ridden exits by three of the founding fathers of contemporary cabaret, Gregory Dawson, who slowly turned the Ballroom, 458 West Broadway, from a restaurant to a restaurant-and-cabaret over the past couple of years, is not yet ready to leave, because he feels that there are many areas of exploration left in the field. Dawson pioneered long engagements for his performers—six weeks to three months—at a time when other cabarets rarely held acts longer than two weeks and often changed every few evenings. Next month he will try another innovation: a series of week-long engagements of Broadway composers who, with friends, will sing their own songs. Starting on Sept. 13, the roster will include Stephen Schwartz, Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, Julie Styne, Betty Comden and Adolph Green, Charles Strouse, Jerry Herman, Sheldon Harnick and Carolyn Leigh.

But even Dawson is not exactly sanguine about the future of cabaret. "I'm a little put off by the proliferation of so-called cabarets," he says. "Not out of any concern for competition, but because I begin to wonder about the effect of so many that are bad. If people, not knowing much about the differences of these places, wander into some of the really awful ones presenting really awful performers, will they be turned off to the whole field? I fear so."

One newcomer to the field—Terry Dunne, who owns Tramps, 125 E. 15th St.—has been feeling his way into cabaret for more than a year and is preparing to take a big step in September. Following the lead of the Ballroom's Dawson, Dunne will book his acts for six-week periods to allow them time to develop and to give audiences the time to find them. He plans to use as headliners record-company acts—acts that are being developed by record labels which contribute advertising and promotion support to the engagement. And, as opening acts, he plans to use comics who, given a six-week period in which to polish their routines, may be nurtured into headliners themselves.

In jazz, the outlook is the brightest in many years. Jazz, according to managers of clubs and producers of concerts, is growing steadily in popularity. But the drawback is that its form of popularity—fusion jazz that mixes jazz and rock or jazz and soul—has put it into competition with pop music and has narrowed its prospects.

The Bottom Line, 15 W. 4th St., which started two and a half years ago as primarily a rock room, now uses jazz acts more than 25 percent of the time (along with country music, classical music, folk music, cabaret and comedy, as well as rock).

"More jazz acts can fill this room than anything but rock," says Allan Pepper, one of the club's owners. "The good thing about the current jazz-rock fusion—played by people such as George Benson, Grover Washington Jr., John Handy—is that it has made jazz accessible to a lot of people. But the bad thing is that it has stifled creativity. Everything sounds alike."

Because these jazz groups

—along with those led by Billy Cobham, Chick Corea and Herbie Hancock—have moved into the area of pop music, concert promoters who specialize in jazz are finding it difficult to get attractions.

"We're up against the pop promoters who use these same acts," points out Julie Lokin of the production organization New Audiences. "As a result, the acts are harder to get and they're more expensive, too."

Picking a careful path between jazz fusion and straight jazz, New Audiences has managed to line up three concerts for the fall season—Tower of Power at Avery Fisher Hall on Oct. 22, Jon Lucien at Carnegie Hall on Oct. 30 and a Woody Herman reunion at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 20.

At that impregnable Greenwich Village bastion of jazz, the Village Vanguard, Max Gordon is still presenting a steady line of jazz groups week after week. Chick Corea, Herbie Hancock and other fusion-jazz groups were once part of his revolving company of bands, but, as with New Audiences, they are now out of his range. But Gordon says the tastes of his audiences are changing.

"The kids are going for straight-ahead stuff now," he points out. "Bill Evans has become a draw once again. Ervin Jones and Sonny Fortune, who used to do just so-so, now do top business here. In fact, we're doing more business now than we did with Corea or Hancock."

At the Village Gate, where Art D'Logoff has usually had jazz somewhere on the premises during the past 20 years, jazz has been moved from the Top of the Gate down to the big room below stairs that has served as a theater for much of the past decade. Dizzy Gillespie will be there this week and Freddie Hubbard comes in next week to wind up the Gate's summer jazz festival.

After that, D'Logoff would like to have a mixture—"Like the old Village Gate," he says, "jazz, comedy, some types of rock, but basically jazz-oriented. I don't want to lose my heritage."

Like Tramps (and like the Bottom Line), he is looking for record-company support. "We can't just put on an unknown act," he says. And, like the Bottom Line, his jazz acts will range from mainstream to fusion.

"The most difficult thing to put on," he says, "is the middle men—people like Ruby Braff and Roy El-drige."

This feeling is echoed by Julie Lokin of New Audiences: "Nobody but George Wein wants to play them in concert."

And George Wein, the producer of the Newport Jazz Festival—well, he's got planning any concerts this year, so far.

"We're going to corporations and foundations to try to get support for some major projects for the New York Jazz Repertory Company," he reports. The Repertory Company had to cancel its 1975-76 season because of lack of funds.

"The problem with the Repertory Company now is that we don't have any money," Wein adds. "We're going to try to get something on this season, but probably not until after the first of the year."

field of special interest, what are the virtues of the present scene? Second, what do you think is missing? Third, what are your suggestions for improving the situation? Deliberately we did not mention the Bicentennial as a point of departure, but inherently this was the reason for our insistence on these very basic questions at this particular point in our history. Two hundred years seems a decent point at which to reassess, even to recommit the American art scene. And while we may not be able to satisfy Miss Stein on the question of the answer, it did seem that our general, tripartite question was modestly pertinent.

The first thing that seemed remarkable about almost all the replies we received was their spirit of optimism. Some arts were more optimistic than others: Dance was positively euphoric in its new sense of importance and value, and its position as the leader of world dance. The art world also seemed fairly happy and, perhaps more strangely, so did the theater. The performing arts are quite clearly very concerned about governmental subsidy and public subsidy. Indeed, this was a pervading concern, and is possibly linked to the growing awareness that most of the arts are fundamentally elitist. This is, of course, a difficult stance for the United States to take. It savors too much of courts and aristocratic privilege; it historically suggests the follies of Europe rather than the sterner philosophies of our founding fathers. Yet, quite clearly, a certain awareness is arising that while the arts may be for all the people, not all the people are for the arts.

Generally the responses indicate an underlying fear that funding for the arts could become a political football, with the party in power unwilling to support to the hilt our greatest institutions, but anxious to spill out money on culturally inclined knitting bees and other folk arts, with that fine old democratic process of votes in mind, while quite forgetting that there are certain cultural values that must not be sacrificed to the merely popular.

Indeed, Martha Graham, with her cryptic, humane wisdom, went to the heart of the matter in one of her responses: "A Greek historian, once writing about a lost civilization, said very simply: 'They had no poets, so they died.' The need for immortality is so great, and the arts are the only thing we can count on." But that is from the oracle. What did the others say?

The euphoria I mentioned earlier — as well as the awareness of elitism — is perfectly summed up by Ivan C. Karp, director of Manhattan's O. K. Harris Gallery. I shall quote his answer in full:

"One television broadcast of professional football probably has a larger audience than all the art produced in the world has had since a caveperson doodled an antelope on a wall in the Dordogne. This may be because the observing of painting and sculpture is an extremely quiet activity, like canoeing on a large, empty lake; though not so healthful. Fortunately, the American art community, in spite of its limited following, is comprised of mostly good-looking characters and there are many excellent cooks among them. This makes for a lively, sensual and well-fed society of relatively happy people among the general population of ordinary Republicans and Democrats.

Alexander Cohen: 'The theater is being rediscovered yet again.'

Tennessee Williams: 'There is a pandemonium of bad connections.'

"American painting and sculpture continues to be the single most significant contribution to world culture since the end of World War II. Of course, almost nobody outside of the American art community understands this... except for a few English scholars in the largesse of post-Imperialist fair-mindedness. But all Americans, while they are watching 'Mary Hartman' or the 11 O'Clock News, may feel encouraged or at least comforted if they keep this in mind. New Yorkers are especially lucky since they are able to see it all happen in the more adventurous art galleries and even, once in a while, in their museums. Nothing could improve the present situation in American art except an annual fine arts convention in Las Vegas."

The same measures of optimism, cynicism and awareness ran through many of our replies. Some respondents did express concern for the present maelstrom in the arts, that particular sense of a non-directional artistic purpose. Tennessee Williams had his own special view of this when he wrote us:

"The state of the American theater naturally concerns me very much since it's where I've lived so long and where I hope to be still living after some quack of a coroner pronounces me dead. My feelings about its present state is that there is a pandemonium of bad connections among managers, playwrights, critics and audiences. It's like a session of the United Nations with headsets all scrambled so that the African delegation is getting all the translations in Lebanese, Iranian and so forth. All in all, I'm happy to sit this one out in San Francisco, England or points East. I know that sooner or later the heads and headpieces will all get relatively unscrambled and the right words will get through again."

Yet, the optimism was definitely pervasive. The soprano Beverly Sills was fairly typical in this respect in talking about the growth of music. She wrote:

"In the last 25 years, our country has seen an evolution in classical music. More people have become exposed to a wider musical spectrum than ever before, either through live performances or recordings. And because of dynamic leadership on several levels and because of the excellent teachings in our conservatories we have been able to put the 'provincial doldrums' behind us."

"Until the early 1960's, we spoke of the Big Four, when we discussed orchestras. Then it became the Big Five (Cleveland joining New York, Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia). Today we might as well speak of the Big Ten or Big Twelve, because at least that many can compete in world terms. The revolution in the so-called regional opera has been even more dramatic. Boston, Houston, Dallas, Santa Fe, San Diego, Seattle, to mention only a few, all have their individual production style and adventure in repertory. Their musical excellence is on a par with most opera houses in the world, and most importantly, they offer chances for our young singers to grow on home soil."

The enthusiasm for the present even extends to our eternal imaginary invalid, the theater. Alexander Cohen, that staunchest and—to use an Anglicism—tiniest of Broadway sharpshooters, is perhaps predictably positive. He takes as his point of departure the current economic resurgence of the Broadway theater—which is an interesting factor, although possibly a wayward one. Yes, Broadway has had its best season in years, and Mr.

The Arts in America: Optimism Tempered by Need

Cohen puts the reason for this perceptively. He writes: "The public's resurgent enthusiasm for Broadway shows, after some lean seasons, is very encouraging. The theater is being rediscovered yet again. I think this is partly because we've had more shows of high quality lately, and also because people have begun to perceive television and, to a lesser degree, films as incomplete experiences; they hunger for the total involvement that the theater alone provides."

Cohen himself feels that "the greatest need is new plays and musicals which excite, entertain, satisfy." Something of the same attitude—perhaps oddly enough—seems to be felt by the dean of the Yale Drama School, Robert Brustein, when he says: "The American theater renaissance begins, first and foremost, with its playwrights who... are managing to weave a metaphorical action out of the cultural and metaphysical fabric of the times." While not quite knowing how you can weave an action out of a fabric (a special Yale sewing-machine perhaps?) One does instinctively understand Mr. Brustein's fervent demand for quality in all areas of the theater. Not so incidentally, he feels the lack of "dedicated actors," "informed and exacting critics," and an audience "seeking genuine artistic experience rather than cocktail party chitchat, Kulkur or mindless diversion." He is, in my opinion, totally right.

One of the most interesting responses from within the theater world came from the actress Tammy Grimes, who happily has always struck me as being as smart as she is beautiful, and subtly off-beat on both counts. Miss Grimes is the existential professional, and she knows what she is talking about. She wrote hopefully and sensibly, and I intend to quote her at some length:

"I am aware that there are theaters functioning—and sometimes even thriving—in Alabama, Connecticut, Minnesota, California and Rhode Island, either in the form of a Shakespeare festival, a repertory company or a small theater doing revivals or trying out new plays with the possibility of a Broadway opening with a limited run. This to me is proof that people are becoming genuinely interested in creating good theater outside the circumference of producers, actors and directors, set designers and lighting artists that are connected strictly with Broadway-bound productions."

"We [also] seem to have recaptured our Broadway audiences that we had lost a few years back. It may have something to do with giving them fine revival productions. . . . [The] subsidized theaters have mostly come through with flying colors and their success is doubly important because of their subsidization."

The prevailing mood of cautious optimism, however, was not felt by everyone. Norman Lear, the television producer, was positively gloomy about the effects of the tube on American life, which is a little like a munitions manufacturer decrying war. Nevertheless, despite the odd corner from which this cri de coeur comes from, Mr. Lear has a palpable point. He writes:

"The present art museum scene is a mixed bag. On the one hand, the museum-going public daily grows ever larger and ever more appreciative of the importance of museums to our cultural life. On the other hand—excepting only a few institutions—money is scarce and getting scarcer. Help must be forthcoming from the Federal Government in the near future or a larger number of museums here and across the nation will be forced to reduce their hours drastically as well as to close off large numbers of galleries."

"What's to relish nowadays? The sense of excitement, joy, life which envelops a successful exhibition; the enormous increase in young people both in the galleries and the crowds of them that spill out onto the great steps and the plaza of the Metropolitan; the feeling that

Eleanor Perry: 'We lack any potent recognition that film is an art form.'

"The biggest current problem with television in our country is that the average viewer is watching it six hours per day. They do so because they have turned inward. They have turned inward because their leadership has not seen the need to inspire them to turn outward. Americans have last touch with one another. Often they live in fear of their neighbors. They have lost the sense that they matter as individuals. I think that they no longer believe that their voices will be heard or that their votes count."

"When Americans began to lose their individual sense of meaning in the world at large, they started to turn inward—and there, in the comfort of their homes, sat the television set. Here, they could observe the passing images of life—because they no longer believed in their ability to participate meaningfully in the reality of life."

"It is my fervent hope that the next four or eight years of leadership in this country, from the Oval Office to the Congress, will serve to inspire Americans to an understanding that they do matter and that life for them as individuals does have meaning. People can be influenced away from six hours of TV viewing per day; they can be inspired to reach out to their neighbors, to reach out to their communities, to participate in life, instead of watching it dance by on a 21-inch tube."

TV writer David W. Rintels strikes much the same note when he says: "The virtues of the present scene in entertainment television are that it has the potential to get much, much better and it probably can't get any worse, though I've been saying that for a long time and I've never been right yet." There's pessimistic cynicism for you, but Mr. Rintels does have a partial answer for us: "Take advantage of the library and read more. Go out to a museum. Talk to a friend in the evening instead of watching TV." Going out to a museum seems to be becoming more popular, and, in contrast to those in television, the museum and art world seemed almost ebullient.

In the reply of Thomas Hoving, director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, you will see this confidence, but you will also note one of the other general themes I touched on earlier: a general concern over money. Mr. Hoving writes:

"The present art museum scene is a mixed bag. On the one hand, the museum-going public daily grows ever larger and ever more appreciative of the importance of museums to our cultural life. On the other hand—excepting only a few institutions—money is scarce and getting scarcer. Help must be forthcoming from the Federal Government in the near future or a larger number of museums here and across the nation will be forced to reduce their hours drastically as well as to close off large numbers of galleries."

"What's to relish nowadays? The sense of excitement, joy, life which envelops a successful exhibition; the enormous increase in young people both in the galleries and the crowds of them that spill out onto the great steps and the plaza of the Metropolitan; the feeling that one must be doing something right despite the laments of occasional nitpickers."

Carter Brown, director of the National Gallery in Washington, expresses much the same guardedly optimistic viewpoint, and re-emphasizes Mr. Hoving's concern for adequate financial support. He tells us:

"Our museums and the marketplace are presenting a variety and richness of visual experience unprecedented in cultural history anywhere. The permanent collections, not just in the two principal centers of New York and Washington but, to a degree unique to this country, spread out across the land, provide an almost inexhaustible feast. Complementing them is a panoply of special exhibitions, inspiring new levels of interest, as in the recent Chinese and Russian loans, and the Tutankhamun show that starts its six-city tour in the nation's capital in November. And never has the contemporary art scene offered more diversity."

"Missing is sufficient emphasis on the less glamorous but no less crucial areas of conservation and scholarly research. Missing, too—paradoxically, in the face of all the popular interest—are adequate levels of financial support to keep our institutions open, guarded, conserving, publishing, interpreting and acquiring as they should. Missing in the contemporary scene is an emphasis on quality over originality for its own sake."

One of this country's leading artists, Robert Motherwell, sees the art scene as something extraordinary. He writes:

"As modern painting completes its task, younger artists are reduced, by arriving so late historically, to adding paragraphs or footnotes often of great refinement, rather than whole chapters to the body of modern art."

"An obvious alternative is 'anti-painting': the searching out of alternatives to the brush, such as exhibitionism, self-mutilation, terrorism, concepts of art instead of art itself, vulgarity, happenings, technology, laser beams to shrimp farms, monumental alterations of the landscape, theatricals, cartoons, parody, painted photographs on enlaid canvas, graffiti; in short, a counter culture against the spirit of the brush, with Duchamp as the patron saint."

"With its endless energy deriving from an international individualism without parallel in any other metropolis, New York continually exhibits this drama in depth to an audience that lives for it. For great art to appear nowadays, it requires artists by the thousands and a devoted audience of millions. New York has both. No other city has either. If only one exhibition in a hundred is interesting, still in the course of a season there are thousands to choose from, from SoHo to the Metropolitan in New York. Enjoy, until the barbarians come, celebrations of individualism in all its subtlety and unexpectedness."

As for the film community, it didn't come up with many answers. Perhaps the toilers in that field didn't understand the questions, or perhaps they are too busy making "Son of Jaws" or "The Godson, Part Six." The latter trend for Hollywood re-

Dance was a great deal more cheerful — as well it might be, for here is an art form in which this country indisputably leads the world. We have just witnessed the completion of the greatest season in American dance history. The ballet's Lincoln Kirstein expressed the matter soberly when he wrote: "The present condition of the dance in the United States is probably better than anywhere else in the world, as far as energy, quality and diversity goes." And Lucia Chase, as befits the lady, was even more bubbly when she wrote: "The tremendous surge of interest in ballet this past year has taken American Ballet Theater onto Cloud 9, and we are making every effort to stay there. We passed the test of playing at the Metropolitan Opera House, and to our joy and pride we equaled the success of the foreign companies."

Martha Graham, as befits her, took a more philosophical view, although she, too, is clearly excited by that company's success this year, particularly the way it completely sold out for two weeks the Royal Opera House treads is, indeed, touched on, if somewhat cryptically, by the filmmaker Peter Bogdanovich. The virtues of the present scene he defines as: "Complete freedom from censorship." (Incidentally, I wonder whether that is true. Is not the box-office, and its demands, the ultimate in censorship?) What Mr. Bogdanovich thinks is missing from the present scene is: "Taste and judiciousness in dealing with the freedom from censorship." And his recipe for improving the present situation is: "More taste and less sequels." Well, I suppose that indicates that we will never be offered "The Last of the Last Picture Show," it may also help explain to some why, although I am a film buff, I nowadays hardly ever go to American movies, with the works of a few maverick directors such as Robert Altman being the infrequent exceptions breaking an all too gloomy pattern.

Another filmmaker, Eleanor Perry, felt much the same but expressed herself at greater and more articulate length:

"What are the virtues of the present scene? That the film industry has survived at all, that films are still being made despite so many disastrous bad and copycat ideas, huge financial demands by non-creative people, screen playwrighting by committee and strangleholds on gifted directors."

"What's missing? Any potent recognition that film is an art form as well as a commercial enterprise. Any acknowledgment that entertainment does not mean simply passing time or playing Halloween tricks on the viewer but that real entertainment engaging his emotions, whether it's to make him laugh or cry, any responsibility to the audience so that it leaves the theater not empty-spirited but exhilarated."

"Suggestions for improving the situation? A hell of a lot less greed. A totally different way of measuring the success and therefore the power of the people who make films, not solely by dazzling box-office receipts but by creativity, imagination, ability, originality—in short, by talent. And, in short, a hopeless suggestion."

Dance was a great deal more cheerful — as well it might be, for here is an art form in which this country indisputably leads the world. We have just witnessed the completion of the greatest season in American dance history. The ballet's Lincoln Kirstein expressed the matter soberly when he wrote: "The present condition of the dance in the United States is probably better than anywhere else in the world, as far as energy, quality and diversity goes." And Lucia Chase, as befits the lady, was even more bubbly when she wrote: "The tremendous surge of interest in ballet this past year has taken American Ballet Theater onto Cloud 9, and we are making every effort to stay there. We passed the test of playing at the Metropolitan Opera House, and to our joy and pride we equaled the success of the foreign companies."

in London's Covent Garden, the bastion of classic ballet. It was the first modern-dance company ever to play there. She feels that American art generally has now "stopped being snobbish about being provincial, and that American dance has tremendous vitality." While she sees "no lack of talent" on the current dance scene, there is "perhaps not enough respect for form."

Miss Graham also noted that dance, alone among the arts (she had overlooked pop music, by the way), is "supported primarily by young people." She mused: "Without the arts what is there? Most young people have no sense of religion, and most people regardless of age have no sense of ritual. The young are suspicious of reading, and television has conditioned them to think and feel in visual terms. The danger of TV is that there is no work involved, the meaning of art is basically work; and too many people nowadays just look, which is why we have so much spectator-sport and spectator-art."

The lines between art and entertainment, between pop art and art, between a mass-commodity cultural product and a man playing a flute in a concert hall, are increasingly confused and confusing. Elitism in the arts is much frowned upon but increasingly necessary. We need a mandarin approach, with the special American provision that anyone who wants to can elect him or herself a mandarin. We need finesse. We need a recognition of excellence.

Schuyler Chapin, the former general manager of the Metropolitan Opera House who is now dean of the School of the Arts at Columbia University, put it right on the line, when he wrote us: "Opera is after all essentially aristocratic and elitist in that it requires intelligence, interest and involvement on the part of its audience. Let's keep it that way. Let's acknowledge its significance by establishing a sustaining pattern of public and private funding that will prevent watered-down productions passing off as the real thing."

The theater's Joseph Papp was poetic on the subject, obviously feeling the loneliness of an art producer and consumer in society. What is Mr. Papp? A modern Lorenzo de Medici? Mr. Papp? That avowed man of the people? Listen to him questioning himself. It is very interesting and thoughtful. He writes:

"It has always struck me, on the way to an opening, how few we theaterfolk really are. It is still daylight, and I'm dressed in black tie and pass all kinds of people coming home from work; see bums, kids playing in the street; and there I go to the most important event in the world, an opening night of a play. Those I pass don't give a damn about the opening—99 and 9/10 of the city is not even aware that there is such a thing. And what about Lebanon, and the man who has been shot dead in Central Park, and earthquakes in China, and catastrophes in Colorado and death on the highway? How unimportant and how removed from the world is that opening night. Are we the only positive expression left of man's hope? Are we on Mars while the rest of the working population is on earth? Check the grosses, Charlie. It was a great week on Broadway, the best ever!"

A lot of people are disturbed by the lack of leaders in the arts and also by the meagerness of public subsidy. A sort of keynote address on this subject was de-

Julius Rudel: 'Art is not and never has been for everyone; it is for an elite.'

Martha Graham: 'The arts are the only thing we count on.'

that were played at night last October produced gigantic ratings that were sufficient to keep NBC in second place for three months, masking the fact that its schedule of regular weekly series was a disaster. Granted these were sports events, but the phenomenon of the great, brief splash also had its manifestations in entertainment programming last spring, with the serializa- tion of Irwin Shaw's "Rich Man, Poor Man" and Joseph Lash's "Eleanor and Frank- lin" on ABC and with the two-part adaptation on CBS of Vincent Bugliosi's book on the atrocities by the followers of Charles Manson, "Hel- ter-Skelter." It was the high- est-rated program of the year. As for the concentration of top box-office movies (the lesser titles are not being purchased by the networks anymore, at least not for prime-time exposure), the in- fluence on the networks has been their arch-demons — Home Box Office and other pay-cable services, which demonstrated during the past two years that home viewers are eager enough to see popular new movies to pay as much as $10 a month to receive them.

In commercial television, the game is not just to get the large audience but to wrest the competition. Powerhouse short-term programs can do that kind of damage, and each network has built up an arsenal of po- tent mini-series and specials to throw against any regular weekly series that has been overwhelming its own regu- lar shows. Coming up this fall, among scores of stand- ard specials, are such Olymp- ic-sized shows as the fol- lowing: separate celebrity- laden tributes to John Wayne, Richard Rodgers, George Burns, Lucille Ball (on her 25th anniversary in television) and Johnny Car- son (on his 14th with "To- night"); "Beverly Hills and Carol Burnett at the Met"; a new musical production of "Peter Pan," with Mia Far- row and Danny Kaye; "Life Goes to the Movies," some- what on the order of the M-G-M retrospectives, "That's Entertainment, I and II"; and a lengthy star- packed salute to American songwriters, "They Said It With Music: Yankee Doodle to Ragtime," which is being produced by Goddard Lieber- son, the retired president of CBS Records.

Concomitant to the limited- series trend is one toward season-long weekly serials in prime time — shows with storylines that continue from week to week, just as those of the daytime soap operas continue from day to day. The soap opera has become a respectable art form after all these years, and it is seen by some network executives as one way to escape the violence inherent in police-ac- tion series.

The new season holds at least four such prime-time se- rials: "Rich Man, Poor Man," a sort of by-popular-demand continuation of last season's dramatization of the Shaw novel; "Gibbsville," based on a John O'Hara story; "Fam- ily," which had a successful tryout last spring; and "Executive Suite," loosely based on the best-seller of two decades ago, but stress- ing interpersonal relation- ships within a large corpora- tion.

Although they promise to reduce violence in prime time, the serials are likely to exacerbate the problem of excessive sex. That sex will rear its controversial head is signaled by the fact that each of the serials has been sched- uled at 10 o'clock, the "adult" hour on the East and West coasts usually reserved for more mature subject mat-programs that shot it ahead of the other networks in popularity last spring. But NBC is gung-ho for the new concept, largely because of its third-place finish last season. Rather than rely solely on the week-to-week pro- grams for its competitive success this time, NBC is es- tablishing a second force of television "events," any of which, as baseball announc- ers say, might blow the game wide open.

Public TV's Season

When unleashed, the rock- ets and flares of the super programs should make for one of the more diversified seasons in years. Regardless of how it serves the business ends of the networks, it is bound to be a boon to televi- sion viewing.

Because of the ebb and flow of the financing to support its programming, and because it has no central program authority like the net- works, the Public Broadcas- ting Service tends to build its schedule on somewhat an ad hoc basis. This has the virtue of creating surprises—new offerings arriving unexpect- edly in the bleak of winter. The new PBS season, how- ever, does have a starting lineup for October that prom- ises more drama productions this year than on Broadway and Off Broadway combined.

The major new entry is "Visions," a weekly series of original dramas by largely unknown playwrights ac- corded top-budget produc- tions on the West Coast. The project has been in develop- ment almost three years and has $6.2 million in funding from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the Ford Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts. It is scheduled to have its pre- miere on Oct. 21 with Conrad Bromberg's "Two Brothers," a play in which one man searches for the root of his brother's mental depression; the leads are to be played by Judd Hirsch and David Spielberg.

"Masterpiece Theater" will open with a four-part adap- tion of Flaubert's "Madame Bovary." Then come "How Green Was My Valley," "Five Red Herrings" and a new batch of "Upstairs, Down- stairs." "Hollywood Televi- sion Theater" starts up again Sept. 16 with Julie Harris in James Pridaury's two-hour drama "The Last of Mrs. Lin- coln." That will be followed by a production of Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author," with Andy Griffith and John Houseman. Among the other plays in the series are George Kelly's comedy "The Fatal Weakness," with Eva Marie Saint; "Philemon," a musical by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt; and a repeat of Fre- deric Hunter's "The Heming- way Player," which aired origi- nally in the spring.

Eugene O'Neill's "Ahl Wilderness" will lead off the new 39-week season of "Great Performances." Also on tap in the "Theater in America" subseries is the Phoenix Repertory Compa- ny's revival of William Gil- lette's "Secret Service" and a production of Shake- speare's "The Taming of the Shrew" by the American Conservatory Theater of San Francisco.

Not yet scheduled but defi- nitely to air this season is the original Swedish TV production of Igmarr Berg- man's "Scenes from a Mar- riage," from which the movie was drawn. "The Adams Chronicles" will be repeated in its entirety, and PBS will also carry three plays origi- nally produced for NBC's "Hallmark Hall of Fame": "Valley Forge," "The Rival- ry" and "Truman at Pots- dam."

Music programs remain abundant with the return of "Live From Lincoln Center," "In Performance From Wolf Trap," "Great Performances," "Evening at Sympho- ny," "At the Top" and "Soundstage."

"Meat" is to be the title and subject of Frederick Wiseman's annual documen- tary. There will also be seven National Geographic specials; "World War I," a 26-part series produced by CBS News, and a repeat of "Civi- lization." In an unusual ar- rangement, "Six American Families," a new series pro- duced for commercial televi- sion by Group W, will also find its way into the PBS schedule this fall.

A major addition to the schedule of WNET Channel 13 will be the presentation of a classic movie every night at 11 P.M., except Sundays. The station intends to create a thematic framework for the films each week. Thus: a week of Russian classics, one of French classics, a week of Fritz Lang (including "Met- ropolis"), one of Truffaut (including "Jules and Jim") and one of Fellini (including "La Strada").

The New Weekly Series

Along with scores of special and "super" pro- grams, the three networks will be introducing a total of 25 new weekly series, most of which will make their debut during the week of Sept. 13. These new series are:

ter. But because of time-zone differences, the hour is 9 P.M.—peak viewing time—in the Midwest and the Bible Belt, and the networks may well be braced for plenty of heat.

It should be noted that the networks are not of a piece in welcoming the era of the super program. CBS remains the most dedicated of the three to the orthodox sched- ule of episodic series, its pro- grammers working feverishly to refresh and refurbish such established shows as "Rhoda" (she gets a divorce), "Phyllis" (she becomes softer and nicer and will have a new set of supporting players), and "Tony Orlando and Dawn" (retitled "The Tony Orlando and Dawn Rainbow Hour," with a greater emphasis on comedy).

ABC is slightly to the left of CBS, more committed to the dramatized novel and the weekly serial, while still nur- turing the lineup of episodic

JOHN J. O'CONNOR

The Changes in News—More Show Than Substance?

To paraphrase an old Bob Dylan lyric: Something is happening, Mr. TV Newsman, or you don't know what it is. Despite, or indeed because of, the fact that various polls have revealed that most Americans get most of their news from television, the "electronic press" remains an object of intense suspicion. Everybody from professional critics to casual viewers has an opinion of the service provided, an opinion that generally runs from scorn to irritable toleration.

The most common complaints by now are a familiar litany: "Entertainment values" (good film footage, attractive anchorpersons and so forth) tend to overshadow news content; time and space are severely limited, reducing most formats to a headline service; reporters tend to be superficial "generalists," unable to follow and analyze major stories in significant depth. Followers of the TV news scene can recite the list like a nun saying her beads. But, then, so can most TV newsmen, and, indeed, there are abundant signals that major efforts to change the situation are in the making.

Like the entertainment executive staffs at the networks, the TV news departments have been undergoing extensive personnel changes in the past year. Some, involving on-air "talent," have been widely publicized: Barbara Walters' going from NBC to ABC; Bill Moyers' from WNET/13 to CBS. Most, involving producers and other off-camera figures, have received less headline attention, although these adjustments could be by far more crucial. NBC's Paul Friedman, for example, is an advocate of what I call "pragmatic news"—features in such areas as consumerism and health. In the past year, he has moved from WNBC's local "News Center 4," which is now crammed with features, to the NBC Nightly News, which acquired a "special edition" feature, to, at present, executive producer of the "Today" show, which is in the process of extensive alteration. Mr. Friedman is obviously someone who could be influential in the future direction of TV news. That future is undeniably hazy for the moment. Over at CBS, Walter Cronkite, Eric Sevareid and Richard Salant, president of the news division, are all in their 60's. Their mandatory retirement at age 65 over the next few years undoubtedly will alter some of the basic images of CBS News. At NBC, John Chancellor has been joined by a remarkably revived David Brinkley in an effort to eliminate a recent ratings sag. And ABC will have to devote considerably more money and effort to improving its news staff if the new combination of Harry Reasoner and Miss Walters is to have any chance for success. Otherwise, Miss Walters is likely to wind up a million-dollar baby in the five-and-10-cent news store.

Elsewhere, particularly on the documentary front, the picture is also fuzzy. The aggressive Av Westin, now a consultant advising local stations' news staffs about the virtues of hard journalism, has been replaced at ABC News by Marlene Sanders, who will have to establish her own approach to, and demands for, news specials. On public TV, Bill Moyers was at his most effective in delivering personal essays with a pointed moral tone. It is still a matter of speculation whether CBS, partial to the objective group effort, will allow him as much personal latitude.

And, of course, this is a Presidential election year. We have seen TV's often extensive coverage of the primaries and the conventions. We have recognized the medium's faults—primarily, a tendency to draw more attention to itself than to the occasion being covered. We have seen its strength—most notably, the transmission viscerally of aston- ishing clear differences between generally liberal Demo- crats and generally conservative Republicans. And we have even encountered noticeable coverage improvements: During the G.O.P. convention, NBC devoted much more time to podium activities.

For example, one seconding speech for the nomination of Ronald Reagan was delivered by a delegate who is from New York, is a woman, and is black—a combination represent- ing a non-typical figure in the Reagan camp. NBC carried Dr. Gloria Tootie's speech, which proved to be one of the better presentations of the evening. CBS switched to Messrs. Sevareid and Moyers for commentaries. And ABC was caught up in floor interviews. Simply covering the news may be one key lesson for network journalism.

TV news is still left with covering the campaign through- out Nov. 2. Past such coverage by the networks, specifically in 1972, has been severely criticized in a new book called "The Unseeing Eye," in which two political scientists from Syra- cuse University interviewed 200 people in their area before, during and after that campaign. They concluded that the power of national television in an election campaign was "a myth." I cannot vouch for the methodology (indeed, I have several questions about it), but their general conclu- sions would seem fairly reasonable. Part of that myth has been buttressed by another book, Joe McGinniss's "The Selling of the President," which described the careful "pack- aging" of Richard Nixon in 1968. But the more intriguing story of 1968 was that, after beginning with a hefty lead in the polls, Mr. Nixon very nearly lost the race to Hubert Humphrey. Packaging is not magical. Reports to the contrary, the voter is not an ass.

In several respects, "The Unseeing Eye" is unfair to television news. The authors charge that the form is undisc- riminating. It lacks a front page and headlines to denote the relative importance of stories. But the viewer gets this message in the "lineup" of the stories. It is assumed that the lead item is the most important, and the rest follow in descending order, down to the lighter features that usually conclude a night's edition. The book's major charge is that television deals more with superficial images (rallies, press conferences, etc.) than with explorations of issues and differ- ences. But the authors focus on only the campaign itself, ignoring the fact that the issues may have been addressed to some extent in television's coverage of the primaries and the conventions. By this point, for instance, many viewers should have at least a glimmer of the basic issue differences between Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter.

Still, the networks can do more than follow the candi- dates from rally to predictable rally (although the legwork drudgery is always necessary; witness the unforgettable footage of the attempted assassination of George Wallace). An election is certainly more than a horse race. "The Unseeing Eye" claims that viewers actually get more valuable information from political commercials, I disagree. Those commercials are preoccupied less with information than with propaganda. Yet, they might make valuable subjects for TV newscasts, which should be preoccupied with information.

The network's nightly news editions will probably be expanded to an hour in the near future. Established formats, such as on the "Today" show, will be dramatically altered. Documentaries may adopt more personal expressions or more flexible "magazine" forms. TV news is undoubtedly moving toward a new look. The question: Can it move into new areas of content?

may be accompanied by a sense of fear and foreboding as familiar standards are toppled and new ones not yet securely established or accurately perceived. It is—in every respect but one—so much easier to live without this hectoring, importuning, unsettling phenomenon of mastery. It is so much more comfortable and relaxed to do without it. Yet, without it, as we sooner or later come to recognize, the life of art is drained of significance and becomes a pastime rather than a vocation and an inspiration, an anodyne rather than an adventure. There's the rub: In art, as in life, it is easier to live without the nagging, unremitting challenge of the highest excellence—but it is also easier to die.

And the visual arts are far from being the only field in which this absence of mastery is now keenly felt. Indeed, compared to other fields, the visual arts abound in talents of a high order. There is something touching, perhaps, but also something dispiriting, in seeing, for example, the way critics and audiences alike, season after season, fall upon the tiniest shred of talent evidenced by any aspiring new playwright, customizing to warm themselves before a fire that has hardly begun to flicker. We so desperately want our theater to produce first-rate writing talent, we are almost willing to take the intention for the accomplished fact. Yet what a relief it is when the theater turns, as it mostly does, to writers produced by earlier and better theaters than ours. When something resembling a new talent does write for the stage today, we are still obliged to say that he promises to be the best thing we've had since Eugene O'Neill, who died in 1953! Instead of playwrights to dominate our theater, giving it a sense of direction and vision, we have producers—or rather, we have our one star producer, Joseph Papp, upon whose promises of a golden age to come we live mortgaged, so to speak, and resigned, meanwhile sneaking off to the movies or the ballet to keep ourselves amused and refreshed and truly interested.

The ballet—and dance of every variety—certainly flourishes, and it is there, if anywhere, that mastery can still be observed as a living thing. One can place the name of George Balanchine beside Stravinsky's and Picasso's without embarrassment or equivocation, and Balanchine, though the most eminent of living choreographers, is by no means alone in giving us the sense of an art in full flower and on a grand scale—an art in a continuous state of renewal and growth. Some day, perhaps, some bright analyst of our cultural affairs will emerge to explain exactly why it is that the art of dance has prospered so extravagantly in our time, whereas the art of opera, for example, has proved incapable for the most part of attracting creative talents of a similar energy and originality.

Opera too flourishes, of course, and is one of the great pleasures of our cultural life—but it flourishes as a performer's, not as a composer's, art. (What composer since the death of Richard Strauss, in 1949, can really be said to command the operatic stage with anything like the old authority?) We do not go to the opera to hear new music the way we go to the ballet to see new choreography. New music has become a specialist's pastime, whereas new choreography has become a major theatrical experience, and this difference places a distinct limit on what any master composer, even should one materialize on the operatic stage, might hope to accomplish in a field that seems for the moment to have forfeited its lease on significant new expression.

There is probably no way to account for the absence of masters at the present time, but it may be worth speculating about some of the conditions that now seem to diminish the very possibility of mastery in the arts. Mastery implies authority, and authority is something our culture has grown to be suspicious about, perhaps even to detest. Mastery implies special distinction and endowment, extraordinary abilities and powers; it invokes the specter of something we now tend to shrink from the very thought of—an elite of talent, if not of genius, that enjoys advantages and opportunities open, by their very nature, to the few rather than to the many. Mastery implies hierarchy, and this is yet another notion we have grown to despise. Our culture lives on easy terms with the idea—and with the phenomenon—of celebrity, for celebrity implies, as the idea of mastery does not, a democracy of opportunity open to all comers.

And so in the arts today we tend to have celebrities rather than masters. We have Andy Warhol instead of Picasso or Matisse. Celebrity requires only admirers, not disciples; it lives on gossip rather than on the discriminations of criticism. We follow its fortunes rather than its achievements, and we do not expect from it—and generally do not get—that discomforting, transfiguring experience that only a true master can bring to his art and to us. Celebrity lives in the present tense, whereas mastery joins the past and the future in a new configuration. Celebrity is fun, excitement, glamour, but more often than not, it marks the end of something in the life of art, whereas mastery signifies renewal and permanence—and it is the sense of something large and permanent now emerging in the arts that we find missing amid the excitements of the present time.

'High' Culture vs. Official Culture

da—but there wasn't even a National Endowment 11 years ago, so obviously we are serious. Official culture, like certain aircraft companies, is not going to be allowed to close out of town. It is perceived to be a kind of institutionalized schoolmarm, there to civilize the cowboys. But not to surprise or scandalize or threaten, which is what American art does at its exceptional best.

Why isn't official culture "high culture"? In preparation for the new season, I've been rereading Dwight Macdonald's "Against the American Grain"—a book scandalously out-of-print—with particular attention to his famous essay on "Masscult and Midcult." Published in Partisan Review in 1960, it stands up remarkably well. Listen: "Masscult offers its customers neither an emotional catharsis nor an esthetic experience, for these demand effort. The production line grinds out a uniform product whose humble aim is not even entertainment, for this too implies life and hence effort, but merely distraction. It may be stimulating or narcotic, but it must be easy to assimilate. It asks nothing of its audience, for it is 'totally subjected to the spectator.' And it gives nothing."

And there is this footnote—with Macdonald, there is always a footnote—a quotation from T. W. Adorno: "People want to have fun. A fully concentrated and conscious experience of art is possible only to those whose lives do not put such a strain on them that in their spare time they want relief from both boredom and effort simultaneously. The whole sphere of cheap commercial entertainment reflects this dual desire."

By Masscult, Macdonald meant Norman Rockwell and Norman Vincent Peale, Leon Uris and rock 'n' roll, most of radio, television and the movies, "a vulgarized reflection" and "a parody" that competes with High Culture instead of paralleling it, as Folk Culture did before Masscult standardized it out of existence. Whereas "Midcult"—the Book-of-the-Month Club, the Saturday Review, "South Pacific," Herman

Wouk, "Our Town," Pearl Buck, "OmniBus," etc.—is Masscult with "a cultural fig-leaf," "a tepid ooze," "a soft impeachment," the product of "lapsed avant-gardists who know how to use the modern idiom in the service of the banal."

It was Macdonald's fear that Midcult would swallow us up with its pieties, as Masscult sought to brutalize with formulae. His only hope was that a "new public for High Culture becomes conscious of itself and begins to show some esprit de corps, insisting on higher standards and setting itself off—joyously, implacably—from most of its fellow citizens, not only from the Masscult depths but also from the agreeable ooze of the Midcult swamp."

This, you will have noticed, is elitism, on the rocks. I rather like it. The terms work. In a 16-year hiatus, "the agreeable ooze" has taken over television and the movies. And a case can be made that official culture is itself Midcult. But what in fact is High Culture? At pains to define everything else, Macdonald was smug on his sine qua non: a muttered "emotional catharsis" here, an ad-lib "esthetic experience" there. Periclean Greece, Elizabethan England, Stendhal, Baudelaire, the Impressionists, Stravinsky, Picasso, Joyce, Eliot and Frank Lloyd Wright.

But, hot-damn, the Sixties happened to Macdonald and the rest of us. Cultural coherence flipped out. Whatever perceptions we had of ourselves (sons of the Enlightenment, progressive, perfectible), whatever presumptions we indulged of our destiny as a nation (missionary of democracy, cop of the cosmos) took a brutal beating. Our leaders couldn't appear in public without getting shouted down or shot down. We couldn't win a war against a bunch of little people in pajamas. Our children despised us and lost themselves in rock music, in the raptures and terrors of drugs, in dreams of blood; high-class, middle-class, working-class—they were all long-haired—we couldn't see their ears, and if they hadn't any ears, how could they hear the eternal verities? High Culture was routed in the academy; Freud is a fink. Popular culture turned to cannibalism: Andy Warhol. The blacks stopped wanting any part of us. Women got uppity. Gays came loudly out of the closet. Athletes behaved like ingrates. Homegrown monks appeared on street corners peddling the nostrums of the East. Movies were dirty and the theater was abusive.

Critics like Irving Howe would say of the decade that "it ordains life's simplicity. It chooses surfaces as against relationships, the skim of texture rather than the weaving of pattern." Sociologists like Herbert J. Gans would decide that there are many publics and many "taste cultures," no one better than another: a high culture, an upper-middle, a lower-middle, a low, a quasi-folk, a youth, a black and an ethnic, even a "tourist" culture.

Howe sees a new sensibility impatient with ideas, with structures of complexity and coherence, with the habit of reflection, the making of distinctions, the weight of nuance. Gans thinks everything weighs the same, all choices are okay, only fuddydiddles have a hierarchy of values, "taste" is merely appetite. Macdonald, while condescending to review movies for Esquire, would probably deplore "punk rock." Meanwhile, other reviewers had to take television as well as movies seriously, and soup cans and graffiti as well.

What other culture was there? Motion, disturbance, affinity, chance may not have been values, but they were facts. High Culture was not, and never has been, a fact in this country. The closest we ever got to it might have been in the 1950's, when the little magazines of which Macdonald approves had pretty much a monopoly on elevated taste: Kenyon, Hudson, Sewanee, Partisan, Art News, Art, American Scholar, Dissent and Commentary. It was a High Culture of critics; the creators of that culture were almost entirely European.

Let's face it: a God in every one of Emerson's trees doesn't constitute High Culture. Neither does a "Moby Dick," a "Leaves of Grass," a "Huckleberry Finn," a "Great Gatsby," a "Sound and the Fury" or a "Sun Also Rises." Nor a Jackson Pollock or a David Smith or a Georgia O-

Keeffe. Nor an A Dowell or an E or a Leonard E or an Edward Albur Miller or Williams or a E Where's the col glue of com would cause t cratic talents to are schools fr body graduates without ante have genius, no have performer bly in dance, clans, structure James, as ever Culture; had he no Culture would invent him.) This Season the Old Is Making News

Major openings next month— at the Met, Andrew Wyeth's works, including this portrait of Christina Olsen; at the Whitney, an Alexander Calder retrospective. Below, Calder with his 1931 "Universe."

Mater" at Columbia University are more rewarding than many a minor French Impressionist painting. Let's hope that visitors will give him a chance.

Still are every bit as much a part of it as Albert Pinkham Ryder and Frederic Church and Augustus Vincent Tack. It's a great subject for a show, even if it might seem better suited to either the Whitney or the Met.

Art history is not wrenched this way or that, but anyone with even one good eye in his head is likely to have a good time.

(which will be there from Oct. 16 through Feb. 6) has been planned with particular care. It deals with two places—Karl Kuermer's farm in Pennsylvania and Christina Olsen's house in Maine—

we should all most wish to see are in Washington, D.C., and not in New York. Morris Louis was not exactly feted by official Washington when he lived there (or when he died there, for that matter, in 1962). But official Washington is doing its best to make up for that now with a full-scale retrospective in the National Gallery of Art, which opens on Sept. 12 and goes on through Jan. 9, 1977.

The other two major modern shows in Washington are of Robert Rauschenberg at the National Collection of Fine Arts (in the Smithsonian Institution at Eighth and G Streets) and of Hans Hofmann at the Hirshhorn Museum.

Hans Hofmann is another matter. That great lusty paragon of his turns up everywhere. He has never lacked for wholehearted admirers.

Back in Manhattan, a quite exceptional warmth of feeling has enveloped the preparation of "Calder's Universe," which opens at the Whitney Museum on Oct. 14 and goes on there through Feb. 6.

The Guggenheim Museum has lately kept to a low profile of its own choosing. But it does emerge from its fall schedule that the Guggenheim is the only institution in New York that has put itself wholeheartedly behind a relatively young artist who does not live in this country.

Those who have seen Damian's work in Paris and elsewhere will know that it is midway between sculpture and architecture. He is not so much a sculptor, in the 19th-century sense, as a designer of visionary monuments, most often midnight blue in color and built up of vast numbers of opaque spheres made up of compressed paper. The monument he has in hand for the rotunda of the Guggenheim will be 44 feet in height. It will be there from Sept. 16 through Oct. 10.

The Guggenheim also deserves high marks for candor in mounting its major painting show of the fall—"Acquisition Priorities: Postwar Painting in America." This consists in part of major works which the museum already owns, such as Roy Lichtenstein's "Preparedness" of 1969 and Franz Kline's "Painting No. 7" of 1952.

When I think of the Pierpont Morgan Library, which I do almost every day, I think of the buzzing of innumerable bees in some very distinguished bonnets. On Sept. 7, the buzzing will call for earplugs of some sort or other, since on that day the library will open three separate exhibitions—"William Morris and the Art of the Book," a group of early children's books of which the library owns either the only known copy or the only copy known to be in this country, and a century exhibition to mark the opening of Wagner's own theater in Bayreuth.

In an inconspicuous way, the Morgan Library has a knack of cleaning up in some highly competitive fields. One of these is William Morris. It not only has the books he collected, it has the books he printed; it has the books he decorated in manuscript, and the medieval manuscripts which helped to shape his ambition.

Orientalists have a pretty good time in this city, too. The Japan House Gallery at 333 East 47th Street is about as near to Japan as you can get without jumping on a plane, and as of Sept. 10 it will have an exhibition called "Shinto Arts" which includes material from 43 Shinto shrines, Buddhist temples, museums and private collections in Japan.

As there is no such thing as an equitable or all-seeing account of the fall season in the dealers' galleries, I shall not attempt it. However, no one in his right mind would not want to see the new paintings by Willem de Kooning at Xavier Fourcade Inc., 36 East 75th Street (Oct. 12 through Nov. 20). The same is true of Frank Stella, who is due at Knoedler Contemporary Art, 19 East 70th Street, from Oct. 2 through Oct. 28, and of the paintings from Arakawa's "Mechanism of Meaning" series, which open the season at Ronald Feldman Inc., 33 East 74th Street, on a date that has not yet been disclosed.

This said, the enthusiast for Titian should be very grateful indeed to the National Gallery of Art in Washington, which is putting on from Oct. 31 until Jan. 2, 1977, a commendable survey of "Titian and the Venetian Woodcut." So tenaciously do we think of Titian as one of the great of all colorists that the importance of his work in woodcut is often left to one side. Thanks are due to the International Exhibitions Foundation both for getting up this exhibition and for the thumping great catalogue which comes with it.

Old Master painting in general doesn't do too well in the New York galleries. The great pictures are there, but they are in secret. Doubtless it is a difference of national mores which leads Agnew's and Colnaghi's and the Heim Gallery in London to put on shows of a kind which we almost never see here: assemblages of up to a hundred paintings, sculptures and drawings of which every one is for sale. But we do have in prospect a very good Claude Monet exhibition at the Acquavella Gallery (from Oct. 27 through Nov. 28). This is primarily a loan show. It includes 68 paintings, with examples of at least five of the subjects on which Monet worked sequentially, and the catalogue has an introduction by Andrew Forge, the recently appointed Dean of the Yale Art School.

Sculpture of the late 19th century never quite rates with painting of the same period. But its relative obscurity and unpopularity means that there is usually something new and surprising to be discovered about sculpture of that date if only—and the "if" in question should be in capital letters—people can be persuaded to go and see it.

A case in point is the show of Daniel Chester French (1850-1931). How many of those who will stand in line for Egyptian art will make a detour through the French exhibition when it comes to the Metropolitan Museum (from Nov. 4 through Jan. 9, 1977)? You could say "one in a hundred" and lose your bet. Yet French was a very good sculptor. His bust of Emerson, his "Death and the Young Sculptor," and even his broad-lapped "Alma

The Greening of Liberty Park

The fact that Liberty Park can, and will be, built in stages, over a period of time, makes a large undertaking of this sort practical in terms of the substantial amounts of work and money required. When it is finished, its two-mile length (about the size of Central Park) will feature a breeze-swept waterfront promenade, backed by meadows and trees in Olmsted's naturalistic tradition. There will be active and passive recreation, and a galaxy of ambitious proposals for food, fun and games includes the restoration of an old railroad terminal for cultural uses at the northern border of the site. That work is proceeding now. At the southern end, 35 acres of landscaping were completed in time to serve as New Jersey's vantage point for the Bicentennial fireworks.

The location of the park is superb. Situated on the eastern shore of New Jersey, immediately southwest of lower Manhattan and directly across from Brooklyn and Staten Island, it is virtually in the center of the harbor's embrace. Unlike the larger and more spread-out National Gateway Park along the open ocean outside the harbor, Liberty Park is totally enclosed by populous land areas. It is as close to Manhattan across the water as to Jersey City inland. This is a key site in the harbor's grand sweep—part of the real and symbolic entrance to the city.

At the moment, except for the initial development at the southern end, Liberty Park is a spectacular dump. It is a derelict landscape of weeds, litter, rotting piers and the flotsam and jetsam of sea and citylife. Even more spectacular, however, is the view from the site—across to the full drama of the New York skyline and the rear of the Statue of Liberty, with ships gliding by. (Ellis Island, recently opened to limited tourism, is also just offshore.) A visit to the area is a surreal experience. Anyone who has explored it comes away with a Man Ray impression of acres of civilization's cast-off paraphernalia and every beer can ever manufactured, in endless sea grass, with Liberty holding her torch aloft in the wrong direction against a theatrical backdrop of Mammoth's towers. It is a sleeper of a landscape, awaiting one mammoth magic touch to awaken to great beauty.

That awakening has begun. Those who watched the fireworks last month from Liberty Park traveled a new road lined with 50 state flags to a large grassy mound circled with more giant flags. There were picnic tables, benches, walks, and that incomparable Statue of Liberty view. The $2.4 million cost of this first 35-acre section was paid for by the Federal Department of the Interior and the American Bicentennial Commission. The state now owns 300 of the projected 800 acres, and expects to acquire another 300 by the end of this year. The master plan includes staging, funding, engineering, operation and management recommendations, as well as the physical design.

Because the New Jersey "green acres" bond issue of 1974 authorizes park development as well as land acquisition, matching funds will be available both for land purchase and for construction of the park. The building of the park is currently phased through 1981, but it will take many more years. Eventually, the southern tip will become a major plaza and harbor overlook, with a marina. A natural marshy area just beyond this point is being preserved as a wildlife refuge. At the northern end, where the site is terminated by the railroad station, the land becomes more urban, and there are visions of Tivoli-type features.

Along the full length of the park's western boundary there will be a meandering waterway, or serpentine. To the east, the entire two-mile waterfront will be a continuous, crescent-shaped promenade lined with willows. The promenades will be backed by a landscaped earth berm that will also serve as a windbreak to make the sunny walk usable all year. This harbor esplanade could be one of the urban area's greatest pleasures. Between the serpentine and the promenade will be a broad green expanse with clustered plantings of black pine and deciduous and flowering trees.

A harbor cleanup, which will remove the debris and old piers, begins this month, financed by two-thirds Federal and one-third State money. The next step is an application to the Corps of Engineers to build the levee for the promenade. Much of the civil engineering, such as earthfill and drainage, will be done by the Port of New York Authority. Next year should see the arrangement of viewing facilities in the wildlife refuge. And users are being sought now for the recycled railroad.

If the plan is vast and visionary, it is also rational and organized, and it is very well begun. Liberty Park could be the most dramatic open space in the metropolitan region in the next century.

Finally, choose a sturdy platform that won't transmit vibrations. Don't touch the camera and don't walk near it. (I use the lawn. A wooden deck, or similar structure transmits vibrations easily.) The result of such a shot will be star trails of different colors and lengths forming parts of concentric rings. The shortest of these (and quite bright) will be near the center. This is Polaris, the North Star.

Surprising as it may seem, you don't need long exposures to capture the stars. The brightest ones will show up as pinpoints on an exposure as short as 1/60th of a second. Using high speed film, the major stars in constellations can be photographed at exposures of one second with very little evidence of the stars trailing. A set of constellation photographs all taken from the same location and at the same exposure can make an interesting teaching tool and are fun to make.

Here are some tips on photographing other astronomical objects:

SUN—Our nearest star is bright enough to use an ordinary exposure meter. Don't damage your eyes by looking directly at it under any circumstances. If you are fortunate enough to visit an eclipse location, by all means take your camera. A moderate telephoto lens will be a big help and a 400mm would give truly impressive views. Since the light during such an eclipse is constantly changing, you must depend on your light meter. Remember, while the main show is in the sky, there is also opportunity during a solar eclipse to get striking photos of terrestrial objects. Keep one eye on the horizon. Rapidly changing light conditions can make for some very unusual photographs.

MOON—Our closest neighbor in space is a lot brighter than most people think. A lunar eclipse series with an ASA 400 film may begin at 11:11 and 1/250th for the full moon and drop down to a 10-second exposure during totality. Here no one can provide a positive guide because every eclipse is different, with some being far darker than others. Without an eclipse the moon can be included in other astronomical shots; particularly interesting are groupings of planets near a crescent moon.

Experimentation is advisable, but don't let any exposures go over one second or movement of the Earth will blur the moon. A moderate telephoto (135mm or 200mm) is helpful with shots of the moon if you want the moon to appear as you remember seeing it. The reason is, the moon always appears to be bigger than it is. The photo will show its real size, and you may find that a beautiful orange full moon comes out as only an unimpressive disc on photos taken with a standard lens.

COMETS — These visitors from outer space aren't nearly as difficult to capture on film as some people may think. In most cases, however, their arrival is unpredictable. We get a bright one about every five years. In 1965, 1970, and this past spring there were truly beautiful ones. The next bright one might arrive tomorrow or 10 years from now. Newspapers usually carry announcements when a bright comet is visible.

The tricky part about comet photography is that a comet is going to be at its brightest when it's near the sun. This means that it will be visible only for a short time before sunrise or after sunset. While the comet will "hold still" for you—at least to the same degree as a star, planet, or the moon—there will be an optimum time and date when the comet is high enough above the horizon (10 to 20 degrees) to be out of the haze and seen against a dark sky, yet still close enough to the sun (which causes the comet to glow and develop a tail) to be bright. Such a time usually comes a week to 10 days before or after the comet passes closest to the sun. Just as with stars, with comets you should take a series of photos. METEORS — These are going to appear on your film (if you're lucky) as a streak of light which will probably brighten at one point and may entirely disappear at another. A meteor is a speck of space dust which gets captured by the Earth's gravity and does a kamikaze-type dive into our atmosphere, usually burning itself out before it reaches the ground.

There are exceptions, and for a spectacular example of one take a look at the July 1974 issue of "Sky and Telescope" magazine. On the cover is a picture of a fireball taken in broad daylight as it crossed the Grand Teton Mountains in Wyoming on Aug. 10, 1972. Your chances of recording such an event (or even seeing one) are indeed astronomical, but there are ways to increase your chances of capturing an ordinary meteor on film. On certain dates each year there are meteor showers. If you pick a time when the moon isn't up (and some years the moon totally spoils such a shower with its bright light) and aim your camera in the direction of the constellation for which the shower is named, you have a pretty good chance of capturing a meteor on film. It will show up as an out-of-place streak on what would otherwise be an ordinary star-trail photograph. When trying to catch meteors, I usually expose my film for 30 minutes at a time. If I think a meteor has crossed the camera's field of view, I close the shutter. Very long exposures increase the risk of the film slowly being fogged by stray light, or in my location, of suddenly being wiped out by an automobile or neighbor's light. Dates of major meteor showers include: Orionids, Oct. 19; Leonids, Nov. 15; and Geminids, Dec. 12. Continued on Page 32 work out a treaty. Franklin worked with Vergennes to solidify French aid, but, perhaps more important, was a symbol of America. The French idolized him and his sayings were treasured and repeated. His portrait was seen everywhere—in shop windows and homes, on medallions, rings, snuff boxes and bracelets. His popularity contributed much to the French decision to provide the Colonies all-out help.

Franklin also appears on the Bicentennial issue from the Cook Islands. He appears on one of a set of three stamps along with a portrait of Capt. James Cook, the explorer after whom the islands are named, and Cook's ship, the Resolution. Accompanying labels explain the link between Franklin and Cook. Franklin was a great admirer of Cook, whose first and second voyages of "discovery" made known to the world the regions of the South Pacific. During Cook's third voyage he discovered Hawaii and explored North America from north of California to Alaska. This third voyage was begun in 1776, and Franklin sought to help Cook with a letter to all commanding officers of American vessels:

"A ship having been fitted out from England to make Discoveries of new Countries in Unknown Seas, under the Conduct of that most celebrated Navigator and Discoverer Captain Cook; an Undertaking truly laudable in itself and to the Benefit of Mankind in general, this is therefore most earnestly to recommend to every one of you, that in Case the said Ship, Now Expected to be soon in the European Seas, should happen to fall into your hands you would not consider her an Enemy."

All the signers of the Declaration of Independence, four on a stamp, appear on a set of 14 stamps on self-adhesive paper from Tonga, with a copy of the document in the background of each complete sheet.

Another massive set, which rates the palm as the most garish of all Bicentennial issues from abroad, is a set of 18 stamps plus souvenir sheets from Equatorial Guinea depicting all the Presidents of the United States. There are two Presidents in gold framed portraits on each stamp. The portraits rest on a background of an American flag in really bright red, white and blue. The paired Presidents come in perforated and imperforate sets. With the perforated set are souvenir sheets showing the surrender of British General Burgoyne to General Gates and President Ford, with the imperforate Washington at Valley Forge and Patrick Henry speaking. St. Vincent, in 1975, in a set of 10 stamps, also depicted all the Presidents.

Thomas Jefferson reading the Declaration is on a horizontal single from Senegal and on a portrait on a vertical single from French Andorra. Mali has an airmail triptych of the Frenchmen LaFayette and De Grasse and Washington. Portraits of Jefferson, Henry, Washington, Franklin, Lincoln, John F. Kennedy appear on a set of 18 from Guatemala, with scenes of great events of the Revolution making up the rest. Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton and Crispus Attucks of the Boston Massacre appear on a set of four from St. Christopher Nevis Anguilla. A painting of Washington is on a single from Cyprus.

Guinea-Bissau, the former Portuguese colony, has a set of six personalities of the Revolution: three American generals, Washington, Knox and Putnam, and three volunteers from abroad, LaFayette, von Steuben and Kosciuszko.

The Bahamas, along with a stamp of the islands and the U. S. on a map, has on another stamp John Murray, Earl of Dunmore, governor of New York in 1770-71, of Virginia 1771-75, and later governor of the Bahamas.

The Maldives, in a set of eight, have combined historic events with portraits by Copley of John Hancock, Paul Revere and Samuel Adams. Earlier in the year, a set from Poland included Pulaski and Kosciuszko, two Poles who aided the American cause greatly. The Isle of Man showed a Manxman, William Christian of Virginia, and his in-law, Patrick Henry. The Channel Island of Jersey showed links between the U. S. and Jersey through individuals such as Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir George Carteret.

First Days
First days of issue in September currently scheduled by the U. S. and Canada—

U. S.—18: Ochs 13-cent commemorative, Ochs Stamp, Postmaster, New York, N. Y. 10001.

Souvenir Cards
Souvenir cards for the Bicentennial Exposition on Science and Technology at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida, which looked to America's future, have been issued by both the U. S. Postal Service and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The USPS cards are $1.25 uncancelled and $1.45 with the space center's cancellation and are available from the Philatelic Sales Division, Washington, D. C. 20265, plus a 50-cent service charge. The BEP card is $1.50 by check or money order from Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Washington, D. C. 20228. The name of the card being ordered should be on the outside envelope.

The Postal Service card features a reproduction of the 10-cent First Man on the Moon airmail stamp of 1969. The Apollo mission was launched from the Kennedy Space Center, and the stamp design depicts the moment when Astronaut Neil Armstrong took his first step on the moon.

The BEP card marks 70 years of scientific and technological advancement from a 12-second flight at Kitty Hawk to a walk in space, with an engraving of the Wright Brothers flight on the left, done by Charles Brooks in 1949, and an engraving of the space walk done by Edward Feiler in 1967.

Statistics
Graphs and charts do not usually appear on stamps but they are in their glory on a pair from Norway for the 100th anniversary of its Central Bureau of Statistics, which combines the functions of a number of U. S. agencies keeping tabs on the cost of living, jobs, trade, production and the like. A 1.25-ore stamp shows graph paper with two random drawn curves, with 19th century figures and a horse and buggy on the left and modern figures and a jet on the right. A 2.00-ore shows a chart tracing the Norwegian national product, with the left ordinate indicating a geometric progression with volumetric indices where 1955 is 100.

Cover Catalogue
Larger than previous volumes, and with more postmark illustrations than ever before, the 1976-77, 43d edition of the specialized catalogue of first-day covers of the United States is now available. The publication has 148 new listings and more than 700 price changes.

Most of the increases are in the airmails and commemoratives, markedly in pre-World War II issues. First-day covers of the 1918 airmail covers have gone up an average of 10 percent. Booklet panes on covers and covers of the 1920's show increases.

The 106-page soft-cover publication sells for $1.50 and is available at stamp stores or from the publisher, The Washington Press, Maplewood, N. J. 07040, with a 20-cent charge for shipping.

Slavs
Plans have been made to organize a South Slavic philatelic society that will meet monthly at the Collectors Club of New York and publish a quarterly magazine. The group seeks to bring in collectors of Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Fiume, Istria, Yugoslavia, Ljubljana, Montenegro, Romania, Serbia and Slovenia. Those interested may write to South Slavic Philatelic Society, 1270 Avenue of the Americas, New York, N. Y. 10020.

Yes, you can buy part-run distribution of the Sunday New York Times... with your own free-standing preprinted insert!

Your advertising strategy right now may not include buying the whole distribution of the Sunday Times—some 1,400,000 copies nationwide. But there is an alternative, in fact, many alternatives, to help you test products, test advertising copy, test marketing areas.

It's done with your own preprinted, free-standing insert—a tried and proved marketing tool that allows you to tell your story to all or part of the first-class readers of the Sunday Times... at a time of your choosing... at a cost substantially less than reaching them through the mails.

For example, the cost of inserting and distributing a two-to-four-page preprint in the Sunday Times in New York City and suburbs (1,000,000 copies) is $17,450. That comes to 1.7 cents a copy. To mail out the same number of copies of your preprint at the third-class bulk postage rate, the cost would be $77,000, or 7.7 cents a copy.

You get measurable response

Hundreds of advertisers have used preprinted inserts in the Sunday Times. They include book clubs, magazine publishers, insurance companies, retail stores, food and drug products, record clubs, film processors, petroleum companies, banks, realtors and land developers.

Most of these advertisers need to get measurable, direct-response dollars-and-sense results. And their preprinted inserts in The Times reach an audience of proved capacity and ability to react positively to advertising. Some advertisers have come back more than 10 times.

Where do you want yours to go?

You can distribute as few as 50,000 preprinted inserts to exactly the areas you want to reach... or you can cover every Sunday Times household for a grand total of 1,400,000. Whatever, we'll tailor distribution to your needs.

Write your own ticket

So, whatever your sales strategy, start selling some Sunday soon. With a preprinted free-standing insert in the Sunday New York Times. For full information, write or call Ron Moss, manager, Special Advertising Projects.

Gardeners Get Help From The Experts

and Maishe Dickman

scientists, explained his research. The main thrust of his work, he said, would be to find a simple, practical way to improve the moisture holding capacity of the sandy fill soil, the entire garden was divided up into plots of 20x20 feet to accommodate about 60 families. Dr. Hill chose two of these plots, near the fence. They were divided into four equal sections, 10x20 feet.

Although the families were free to choose any crops they wished to grow and arrange them any way they wanted, Dr. Hill planted each of his four plots exactly alike. Only the soil treatment was different.

On the first plot, he spread a three-inch layer of leaf compost and rototilled it in to a depth of six inches. The second plot was covered with eight inches of a high quality loam topsoil over the sandy fill.

The third plot was seeded and transplants were set out. Dr. Hill folded long sheets of newspaper into a four-layer thickness, scratched the soil surface a bit, laid the paper between the rows as a mulch and covered it with a half-inch layer of soil. The fourth plot, the control, was untreated.

His crops were rows of onion sets, tomato, broccoli, cabbage, pepper and eggplant seedlings and rows seeded to squash, beans, beet, carrot and lettuce. Crops started coming in in June. "Although the harvests are still coming in, it's a toss up on total yield between the compost treated plot and the one covered with topsoil," said Dr. Hill. He can make a more definite conclusion later in the season. But one thing was clear, where the soil was improved, the crops were more prolific.

Dr. Hill made another important observation. "Last June the leaves of the beans that were growing in the plot treated with compost began to yellow. Soil tests confirmed that the nitrogen ran short. What probably was happening, the bacteria that decompose the fibers in the leafy compost utilize nitrogen in their metabolism and it was not available to the plants. Supplemental nitrogen will be important next summer," he said.

Water was available for the garden plots and Dr. Hill found again, benefits from organic matter. Water penetrated twice as deeply in the sandy fill soil as it did in the plots treated with compost and topsoil layer. Where there was compost, the water held better near the vegetables' root zones.

Although Dr. Hill's main efforts were with his four small plots, he made himself available at least one day during each week to answer some of the community gardeners questions and lend them guiding hands when he could. "Many of the people who garden here came from southern rural backgrounds and are good gardeners," he said. "Others are willing learners."

The garden was not without some problems. A few families were discouraged at the start when there was so much rubble and some debris and they abandoned their plots. But other interested families quickly filled in and planted.

Insects found their way to the plants, particularly aphids which were chased out by an invasion of lady bugs. Adults of the squash vine borers made their appearance in late June and laid eggs at the base of the vines. The borers had already begun their damage.

Dr. Hill pulled up one of the squash plants which was half wilted. Near the crown, the main stem was chewed through and rotted, work of the borers. Dr. Hill got out his pen knife and cut open the stalk to search out the borers. He found four of the critters and quickly squashed them underfoot. "I tell gardeners here to do the same thing. If they don't, borers will overwinter in the soil to infect the garden again next year."

But all was not work without some play. Scattered throughout the garden were some handsome looking scarecrows, each with individual character. Maishe Dickman explained that they had been part of a party they had on the site as a way of getting the people more involved.

And the plans for next year? Compost for the soil was obviously a good thing. Dr. Hill said that the city's public works department had agreed to give the garden about 10,000 cubic yards of leaves collected from the city's streets, about one-tenth of the total collected. It will be composted in a vacant lot just across the street from the garden site.

"We expect this will yield us about 1,000 cubic yards of leaf compost next year. We will distribute it to all the gardeners so each plot will receive at least two to three inches of compost to rototill in. Of course, we'll have to fertilize again, too," he added. JOAN LEE FAUST

Tips on Jade Plant

Jade plant is a particular favorite with house plant gardeners because it responds well when the growing conditions are right: full sun, sandy soil and just enough water. . . . But when the jade plant does not grow indoors successfully, the major fault is watering, overdoing it. Another fault could be not enough sun.

Some good growing pointers on the intricacies of jade plant have come from Longwood Gardens, Kennett Square, Pa. The gardens have been growing the plants in their desert greenhouse for over 25 years. First, the soil recipe. Jade plant needs a potting mixture that drains well. They recommend: one part shredded peat moss; one part soil and one part sand. As soon as jade plant becomes rootbound, transplant it into the next size pot.

Here is a good point for watering. Longwood's horticulturist, Charles Bottomley, worked out a precise watering schedule based on monthly precipitation charts in the plant's native habitat, the coastal regions of tropical South Africa. From May through August, watering sparingly. In the winter months, soak the plant once each week. Let the soil dry out completely between waterings. Gradually increase water, September through February. Decrease water starting in March.

Jade plants form their flower buds in October and bloom during December and January. Temperature has a lot to do with this. The desert greenhouse is kept at 70 degrees during the day but drops to 55 at night. Cool nights are important to jade plant flower bud set.

Two other helpful hints. Fertilize only when the plant receives large amounts of water. Avoid using any pesticides around jade plants, particularly malathion and Meta-Systox-R which cause leaf drop.

Answers/Questions

BROWNED IVY [Aug. 15]

A. M.F., Manhattan, noted that the English ivy planted around the base of their street trees has turned brown around the edges. She asked why this is happening and what to do about it. The browning of the ivy leaf edges could be caused by: dogs; residue in soil from salt used on sidewalks to melt winter ice; pollution from street traffic. Adequate watering during dry spells to help flush soil and rinse foliage plus application of a high nitrogen fertilizer are two possible remedies. Ed.

MAPLE SEEDLING [Aug. 15th]

R.B.R., Kendall, N.J. has a maple seedling that took root in her perennial border. She asked when and how to transplant it. This question brings up a good point. If a volunteer seedling is a worthy species to mature to a full sized tree, well and good. The tree can be moved safely now with a good root ball. However, tree seedlings often appear as weeds in gardens and unless there is good growing space for them and they are known to be a species worth keeping, tree seedlings might just as well be treated as any other garden weeds. Ed.

SOFTENED WATER [Aug. 15]

D.L.U., Akron, Ohio asked if it is safe to use water that goes through a water softener on plants. David X. Manners, a Connecticut reader, replies, "Plants have widely varying tolerances to water that has been softened. Some can be adversely affected by the soluble salts in softened water and these salts cannot be removed by any filter. There is no need to use softened water on lawn or garden. All home water softening installations either by-pass outdoor hosecocks or have a by-pass at the softener permitting flow or unsoftened water to hosecocks."

Working With Wood Moldings

ordinary "dressed like a custom ings (de- the joint ceilings) door so is of re- geometric re a three- around ke nailing group of ace). entire wall areas can be given an interesting paneled effect by using moldings to form squares, rectangles, or similar shapes on the wall. The space inside these "frames" can then be filled with a bold wallpaper pattern, or simply painted in a contrasting color. Simple cabinets, built of plywood, can be given a professional, finished look by using moldings to finish off the edges, or to cover exposed end grain and poor-fitting joints. Even old pieces of furniture can be given an entirely new look by using moldings to dress up drawer fronts, headboards, and other flat surfaces, after which the piece can be painted while the moldings are finished in a contrasting color.

In all of these jobs, as well as in other projects calling for the use of wood moldings, a neat looking job will only result if the pieces are neatly cut for a snug fit, and if joints are carefully made so that pieces fit together without ugly gaps or openings. The techniques involved in doing this are not difficult to master, but an accurate miter box is needed (for cutting moldings off at a 90-degree or 45-degree angle), plus a sharp, fine-tooth saw and a combination square. A coping saw (also called a hand jigsaw) will also be needed for some jobs.

Miter boxes may be made of wood or metal. The wood models are essentially U-shaped troughs with slots cut across the vertical sides of the U at a 90-degree angle and at 45-degree angles. The 90-degree slot is used as a guide for the saw when cutting straight across, the 45-degree slots are used as guides when one wants to miter the moldings so two pieces will fit together to form a right angle (the type of joint used in making picture frames). Metal miter boxes have an adjustable saw guide that can be set at various angles from 90 to 45 degrees, with the molding lying on the bottom against a vertical support.

When making miter cuts in quarter-round, flat or half round moldings, one simply lays them flat in the bottom of the miter box, then cuts them off at the desired angle. However, when mitering cove moldings or crown moldings which normally fit into wall-ceiling joints at a slope or angle (rather than flat against either the wall or the ceiling), the molding should be placed in the miter box in the same position that it will be when installed.

One trick that many professionals use when cutting decorative moldings to fit on inside corners is to cope the moldings, rather than mitering them. This technique (illustrated in the drawings at right) actually makes a neater and often more accurate fit than mitering—particularly when moldings are being attached to adjoining walls and the corner is not really square.

As shown in the drawing, a coped joint is created by first cutting the end of one piece off square, then simply butting this into the corner of the wall. The other piece is then coped at the end as shown—that is, instead of mitering it the end is trimmed off in such a way that a profile is cut into the end which just matches the face of the piece of molding already in place. This is done with a coping saw, a type of saw that permits cutting tight curves accurately.

There are various methods that can be used to cope moldings, but the simplest for the amateur to understand is the method pictured. This calls for scribing the outline with a small compass, or when applicable, tracing the outline on the back of the piece to be cut.

When nailing moldings in place, small finishing nails should be used. For small moldings with curved faces it is best to drive the nails in until the head is about 1/4 inch from the surface, then drive the nail the rest of the way in with a nailset or punch to keep the hammer from damaging the molding.

Another point to remember when nailing cove moldings, crown moldings or quarter-

Home Clinic

Q: My bedroom closet is directly over the laundry room in my unfinished basement so the closet smells damp and develops mildew when the door is kept closed. The basement is damp, especially the floor, but I don't want to improve the basement. Is there a way of lining the closet to be impervious to the moisture coming up from the basement below? —Mrs. J. V., Great Neck, N.Y.

A: You should do something about the dampness in your basement because even if you can keep it out of the closet it will find its way into other parts of the house upstairs and may cause other problems. I would recommend installing a dehumidifier down there and keep it running in humid weather. As far as the closet is concerned, you can cover the floor with vinyl tile or sheet flooring, and cover the walls with a vinyl wallcovering, since these are both vapor barriers. However, I would also recommend installing louvers in the closet door so that air will circulate.

Q: We have purchased an old house with a brick front that has many years of white paint on it. We plan to have the brick sandblasted to remove all the paint. Since the brick is about 40 years old, is there anything we should apply over the brick to seal and weatherproof it after the paint is removed? —Mrs. A.C.T., Upper Montclair, N.J.

A: Brick normally needs no waterproofing or sealing, regardless of age, unless it is unusually bad. As a rule, if problems do develop it is in the mortar joints, rather than the brick. I would wait till the brick has been sandblasted, then inspect the joints to see if they need tuck pointing.

Q: About 30 percent of the wood shingles on the outside of my 40-year-old house will not hold paint. Two or three years after paint is applied it flakes off down to the bare wood. I apply two coats of oil base primer, followed by two coats of latex paint. I suspect some previous treatment of the shingles because then it would happen to all the shingles as to what can be done? —G.J.S., Shelter Island Heights, N.Y.

A: I doubt if the problem is due to previous treatment of the shingles because then it would happen to all the shingles, not just some. When paint peels to the raw wood, the most common cause is moisture behind the paint, and with wood shingles this is a frequent problem if they are painted instead of being stained.

Mr. Murphy and his compatriots at... G.M. are counting on several factors to... sell the first of the new generation of... cars. First, they say the new cars are... as roomy inside as the old ones. Second

Managers Continue to Pick Up Stale Teams—

By ANNE COLAMOSCA

"The last thing I want to do right now is to move to another Godforsaken chemical plant in the middle of nowhere," complained the 32-year-old chemical engineer who's been told to move to a remote part of Wyoming. This engineer just spent seven years in West Virginia for his company, and was brought in to the headquarters, 30 minutes from Manhattan, for more management training with the promise of a regular job here.

He liked that because he had grown up in Rye, N.Y., and the company, of course, paid for the move. "But suddenly," says the engineer who doesn't want his name used, "they tell me that I am needed very much in operations again. Apparently, there aren't enough young managers out there with my experience. If I put my foot down and demand to stay where I am, I could be in trouble. The problem is, I don't want to leave, since I have a good reputation with this company, and I've worked hard."

The company is sweetening the offer with a salary increase, a title of assistant plant manager and good moving benefits. On the other hand, his wife with a three-month-old baby, living in a rented house in New Jersey is unhappy about the idea of another big move now, especially to a remote part of Wyoming after seven years of West Virginia.

He's about decided to move to Wyoming. Just a few years ago, chroniclers of the new management class were heralding a dramatic change from the lock step generation of organization men of the 1950's who went where they were told, few questions asked.

New professionals, the reports went, were determined to lead their own lives rather than be pawns on the corporate chessboard. It now appears that management men are still moving, although getting them to go may be more costly.

A survey by the Employee Relocation Council of Chicago, a clearing-house for information on transfers, shows that moves this year will be up at least 10 percent from 1975. Even during the recession, the council says, the average number of corporate moves held steady.

"There's no doubt that they are complaining," says Peter DiDomenico, director of the council, "but with a little convincing, they're still moving. There are a small percentage that will not move no matter what, but if they are in their early 30's, there's a good chance they won't do as well" in their companies.

Moving consultants say corporations spend $12,000 to $15,000 per move, and sometimes more. Although many companies have trimmed spending on house-hunting trips by employees but are giving no help. "It's no secret... niles are not being... says a New York... of a major con... could get these... down a sewer if... We need them... That's the way... corporation func... DICK GRIFFIN

It's a quick study, Bill, how else could a man know more about the meat business than to cook a T-bone?

Watchman Jr. is such a top spot at Swift was hardly a matter of financial duress.

But Swift, which was accounting for 81.8 percent of Esmark's revenue last year, produced only 43.2 percent of pretax profits.

Esmark wanted Swift to concentrate more on brand name products on which the profit margin is greater than others.

"I didn't walk down the hall and tell the people at Swift one day that Bill Watchman was going to be their new president," said Mr. Kelly.

A majority of Chicago's top executives live in large homes in the wealthy North Shore and northwestern suburbs.

In this case, that means buying a cooperative apartment in a fashionable area overlooking luxurious Lincoln Park.

Mr. Watchman was born and grew up in Teaneck, N. J. and is a graduate of Lehigh University and of the Navy's officer candidate program.

After the Navy he joined a small firm as product manager, but soon switched to the Kenyon & Eckhardt advertising agency.

The agency business wasn't his goal, however. He had his eye on general management in a corporation and after a few years with the agency he drew up a list of a dozen target companies.

Coincidentally, he was invited in 1963 to be interviewed for a job at Colgate, one of his target companies.

Then he was told he was going to Mexico City as head of Colgate-Palmolive's highly profitable Mexican subsidiary, so he started taking a cram course in Spanish.

Back to Manhattan went the corner, ultimately as head of all Colgate's domestic consumer divisions.

"I had fully expected to finish out my business career at Colgate," Mr. Watchman said.

After a while we decided we'd be better friends if we weren't business associates," says Mr. Watchman.

The Holt Investment Advisory presents... Unconventional Strategy for the Bear Market Ahead

Confounding bulls and bears alike, the market has trended neither upward nor downward for more than half a year. History suggests, however, that such a horizontal pattern can't persist very long. At some point, the averages will break out of their narrow trading ranges. Chances are, the subsequent market move will be quite sharp.

Specific Recommendations

But a bear market is nothing to fear, as long as you don't "freeze" and ride it all the way down. Indeed, to many innovative investors, sharp market movements—down as well as up—represent unusual capital-building opportunities.

A Banking Ballad From Jail

at the Janoff Credit Corporation, a small consumer finance company here, from 1961 to 1970. His book covers the next three years, during which he remained attached to Janoff but helped start and became immersed in a smorgasbord of ventures starting with development of a ski resort near Steamboat Springs, Colo.

By late 1973, when many of his ventures had been merged into a corporate shell called Recreation International, Mr. Stone listed personal assets of $2.7 million. While his banker, Algoma, went bankrupt, Mr. Stone never did.

It was Robert Rautenberg, Mr. Stone writes, who taught him how bankers keep examiners off their backs by shunting loans around. Mr. Rautenberg, then head of the correspondent banking division of the Marine National Exchange Bank, now faces a perjury charge resulting from a state investigation of kickbacks.

Mr. Stone was convicted in Federal District Court in Wisconsin last month and drew a prison term of a year and a day, after extensive plea bargaining and no contest pleas to charges of being involved in bank kickbacks, securities fraud, failure to register stock and filing false financial statements.

He is one of the few people involved in the scandal to be jailed so far. At least one person involved in the prosecution said Mr. Stone's testimony was essential in the conviction of Walter O'Connor, the former president of the Algoma bank who set up the two credit lines of $1 million each for Mr. Stone.

Mr. O'Connor, who served a 90-day sentence on the conviction for kickbacks, still faces state trials on charges flowing from the probe. Two other bankers face similar action. Leo Roethlisberger, a Wisconsin businessman whose interests became entangled with Mr. Stone's, was indicted this spring by Federal authorities.

In his bid for wider attention for the case, Mr. Stone sent a 23-page analysis, naming individuals and banks, to Senator Proxmire, offering to back up some of his more general charges with records, explanations, and sworn testimony.

Senator Proxmire responded in a letter sent to Mr. Stone just before the book was published, saying he had referred the analysis to both the General Accounting Office and the Justice Department.

A Proxmire staff aide said recently the G.A.O. would investigate the alleged abuses in connection with its current audit of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve. The Senator is backing legislation to merge these three, the Federal regulators of the nation's banking system.

The G.A.O. confirms that it is considering the charges, but says that whether it would take them in that precise context has not yet been decided.

This month, Mr. Stone also mailed an "open letter to American bankers" to top executives at the 300 largest banks in the country and all of the banks in Wisconsin.

A separate letter went to David Rockefeller, chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank. A Chase subsidiary, the Chase International Investment Corporation, is claiming $1.86 million in the aftermath of the bankruptcy of Mr. Roethlisberger.

Mr. Stone's allegations aren't going down well with bankers, many of whom term Algoma an isolated case.

Chase acknowledged receipt of the Stone letter, but refused further comment. (Mr. Rockefeller is on vacation.)

Lee Gunderson, president of the Bank of Osceola, Wis., and chairman of the American Bankers Association's communications committee, said he crumpled up Mr. Stone's letter soon after it arrived. "He was husting his book," Mr. Gunderson said. Eric Milidberg, the state banking commissioner, simply branded the Stone material a collection of falsehoods, generalities and unintelligible analysis of past events.

He refused to comment at all on the substance of Mr. Stone's critique because, he said, "convicted felons should not be able to further capitalize on their crimes by writing books, especially if such books tend to romanticize the crime."

On the other hand, Mr. Milidberg has critics of his own.

David Mebane, United States Attorney for the Western District of Wisconsin, who was with the state's Justice Department when the probe began, recalled difficulty in getting Mr. Milidberg to provide state investigators with bank examinations needed to bring prosecutions.

Other state investigators also complained, saying that Mr. Milidberg, fearful of hitting the image of other banks in the state, was slow to cooperate with them.

Meanwhile, Mr. Stone is moving earnestly into his new career as a writer. Next year, he plans to go on the lecture circuit.

He still owes the state $35,000 of a $50,000 fine and remains indebted to many creditors—he signed personal guarantees for more than $20 million, but much of this indebtedness is shared by others.

In an ironic twist, at least some of his bank debts will be satisfied by proceeds from the book. Mr. Stone has assigned 17.5 percent of his gross royalties to six small banks and the F.D.I.C., as well as for Algoma and for the American City Bank and Trust Company in Milwaukee.

American City failed last year in one of the largest Midwestern bank involvements in recent history. Mr. Stone, ever the promoter, implies in his book that his own escapades were responsible for doing in the $112 million bank, to which he owed far less than he did Algoma. But others familiar with the American City case say his role was minimal.

But why, after alluding to some of the specific allegations of banking abuse in his book, did he then save those specifics for an audience limited to regulators and bankers?

Harvey Plotnick, president of the Regency publishing company, said Mr. Stone originally had come to him with an outline that called for an exposé of the complicated abuses illustrated by his venture. That wouldn't sell, Mr. Plotnick decided.

Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers of Mr. Erdman's novelized guides to international chicanery, might disagree. The first became a best-seller. On the second, Mr. Erdman said he sold the movie rights for a quarter of a million dollars.

wracked by political crises last year, but has since calmed somewhat.
 By good planning or mere serendipity, the major beneficiaries of the spotty revival of European travel this year are likely to be two British companies, Trust Houses Forte and Grand Metropolitan Hotels, which are also the biggest hotel chains in Europe.
 Forte (pronounced forty), which claims to be the

the company is doing better than ever.
 A lot of the company's strength goes back to decisions it made in 1973, Europe's best year ever for hotels, and the years immediately before. Forte then was trying to expand its medium-priced Post Houses around Europe.
 "But everywhere we went," said Dennis Hearn, a director of Forte, "we found Americans falling over themselves

"It was a property speculator's boom, not a hotelman's boom," said Mr. Hearn. And the speculators put up hotels like the Cunard and a half dozen hotels around Heathrow Airport, which now has one of the world's largest concentrations of hotel rooms. Sheraton is there and so is Holiday Inns. Forte's Post House is there, too, but it serves motorists, not air travelers, and is operating at close to full occupancy.

ride from the parts of the Right Bank where tourists who can afford to stay at such hotels spend most of their time.
 Sometimes, hotels are overtaken by circumstances they can't control. Hilton's other hotel in the Paris area, for example, is at Orly Airport, south of the city. But the big international flights that deliver the people who are the hotel's principal business are being rerouted to the new Charles de Gaulle Airport, north of Paris.
 Meanwhile, Grand Metropolitan has another sort of problem in Northern Ireland, not unlike one that Forte has in Cyprus.

Grand Metropolitan's Europa is the best hotel in Belfast but it is also the most bombed. Bravely, after each bombing, it shuts down, rebuilds and reopens.

Brussels has been a disappointment for many of the big chains. Sheraton, Hilton, Forte and Grand Metropolitan are among the many that moved in there thinking that Brussels would become the business and political capital of Europe. It hasn't thus far. Three or four hotels have closed, including the Knott chain's well known Westbury.

"Demand for holidays in Spain," Mr. Hearn said, "was based on the cheap Spanish economy. So what happened? Wage demand after wage demand. There is going to be a situation there in two or three years where hotels are going to be two a penny." Forte doesn't have a single hotel in Spain.

American hoteliers and some of the European chains as well have difficulty in adjusting to the variations in national tastes. Novotel, a French chain and probably the third biggest in Europe, is now spreading into Britain. British hoteliers claim that Novotel is importing French staff to give its hotel a French flavor — but they don't speak English.

What hurts a hotel most is location. Along with the remote Cunard International, London has the posh new Tower Hotel, a member of the British Strand chain. It stands just outside the Tower of London, presumably, travelers don't avoid it for fear of the ghosts of the people who lost their lives there, but the Tower Hotel is a good half-hour hike from Piccadilly.

world's biggest hotel chain, operates the Post Houses Group in Europe, Travelodge in the United States, a variety of resort hotels and a luxury group that include the Hotel Pierre in New York and the George V and Plaza Athenée in Paris.

to develop hotels." Indeed, many of the biggest American chains—Sheraton, Holiday Inns, Hilton, Intercontinental and Ramada Inns—were pouring into Europe.
 Meanwhile, in Britain, the Government was concerned that the country lacked sufficient hotel space. So for two years, it granted up to £1,000 (now worth $1,780) for each room developers would build. Everybody built, except Forte.

"Hoteliers who built in the boom forgot the key thing," said Melvyn Greene, London's best known hotel industry consultant. "The key to success is location, location, location."
 By that, he means you shouldn't have to take a bus to Piccadilly, or the Champs-Élysées, or the Via Veneto. Yet, in Paris, both Hilton and Sheraton built on the Left Bank, a long trip by foot or subway or an expensive taxi 60's" the company admits and the Southern city now has a glut of hotel rooms.

 On Wall Street, there also is a lingering concern about the relationship between Hyatt and the Pritzker family. One factor is the family's supposed wheeler-dealer approach to business, that analysts say led Hyatt into land development and other diversification projects that caused big losses.

Another factor is possible conflicts of interest between the Pritzkers and Hyatt because the publicly-held hotel corporation leases nine hotels from a Pritzker family company, Hotel Equities Inc., and operates three others owned partially by still another Pritzker company. Indeed, three of the five hotels on which Hyatt wrote off $13 million to cancel leases last year were Pritzker-owned.

In addition, the family owns 50 percent of Hyatt International Corporation, which was spun off in a rights offering to Hyatt Corporation shareholders. Hyatt International operates 28 hotels in 22 foreign countries and the new United Nations Plaza hotel in Manhattan. The family also has lesser interests in some other hotels operated by Hyatt.

The Hyatt chain began when Jay Pritzker bought a small hotel near the Los Angeles airport in 1957 from Hyatt von Dehn a real estate developer. It still was little more than a modest West Coast chain until 1967, when Hyatt through the Pritzkers raised the $18.9 million to complete the building of the Atlanta Regency whose Portman design had scared off investors.

 In addition to its hotel business, the company has become one of the nation's largest operators of hospitals, acquiring six of its own and operating more than 15 others under lease and contract arrangements, a business that seems to be a success, although some other diversification acquisitions have been sold at a loss.

Industry analysts also believe the rapid Hyatt expansion may be slowing down because Hyatt shares the same economic climate as the rest of the lodging industry. Nationally, hotel-motel receipts are up 15 to 18 percent this year over 1975, analysts say, with some of that accounted for by room rate increases. But large insurance companies and other institutional investors who provide much of the money for major hotel projects have all but stopped financing them recently.

"When you're talking about upwards of $50,000 a room for a hotel in a major city, you have to remember the industry's traditional rule of thumb that you have to charge one one-thousandth of the cost as the room rate," says a financing specialist of Prudential Insurance Company. "That means you've got to get at least $50 a night, and there just aren't that many people who are willing to pay that much in a lot of cities."

In a few cities, New York and San Francisco, for example, $55 a night isn't uncommon, although businessmen who write the cost off an expense account may not complain. But there's worry, anyway.

Motels are overbuilt and while "the hotel sector is not overbuilt in general—there is a good underlying demand in some cities—the economic problems are just there," says Mr. Raskin of Dean Witter.

In some cases today, new hotels are going up as part of city center retail-office-hotel complexes, such as Kansas City's Crown Center, San Francisco's Embarcadero Center, where Hyatt has a hotel, Atlanta's Peachtree Center, the Watergate complex in Washington, Water Tower Place in Chicago and Detroit's Renaissance Center. In the future, though, some of these analysts say, expansion will come by adding wings or rebuilding older hotels, such as New York's Commodore, with the big chains, such as Hyatt, Hilton, Marriott and Western International, talking over the older independents, possibly under management contracts.

The problems don't seem to worry Hyatt. "Our rates are going up again," says Mr. Foley, the executive vice president. "We try to raise rates 8 to 10 percent a year, and we're barely keeping up with inflation. There may be a point above which we shouldn't go, but we haven't reached it yet. Occupancy is still going up."

Major Hyatt executive said the company had Las Vegas—that the gambling capital didn't make.

And I believe it is possible Hyatt Hotels about the possibility of their making an Nevada."

Central States Pension Fund, was experiencing heavy losses. He said placed a call to the then executive secretary of the fund, "introduced myself and said we were prepared to take it over if we could get a $30 million debenture loan from the pension fund."
 "They had about $20 million invested in it, and it was a disaster under our deal, they would sell us the property for $30 million payable at 6 percent with no payments for a couple of years, if we would agree to put up $2.5 million to improve it," Mr. Pritzker said.
 "If anything went wrong that would be the extent of our loss in return, we would get a $30 million loan at 3 1/2 percent. As we saw it, we were paying $2.5 million to get a $30 million debenture at attractive terms." So far, he said, the property seems to be doing well, but it is too soon to determine whether it will finally be profitable.

Thus, Hyatt is paying $20 million for the hotel at a low interest rate and has borrowed another $30 million from the Teamsters fund, too.
 Before both acquisitions, Mr. Pritzker said, Hyatt retained a lawyer to contact Stanley Sporkin, the S.E.C.'s chief of enforcement, who was known to be concerned about publicly-held companies going into the Las Vegas market.

"We knew there was nothing wrong with it, but the S.E.C. was showing a great deal of concern. The response was that it would be okay if we disclosed everything, if we disclosed the ties to the union through the loan, which we have done.
 According to a Hyatt report filed with the S.E.C., the $30 million loan was arranged by Melville Marx, a Hyatt director and first vice president of Dean Witter, which was paid $150,000 for arranging the debenture. R. L.

Do the Democrats Have an Economic Issue?

By FREDERICK L. DEMING

Do the Democrats have an economic issue? The public opinion polls indicate that economic problems head the list of voter concerns. At the same time they point to more interest on the part of voters in the character of the candidates than in their specific stands on issues or programs. Also, we are told that voters, particularly the younger voters and the liberal voters, perceive the economic questions not only to embrace growth, jobs and income but also to include urban problems, the environment and resource conservation. Finally, there are some indications that more austerity in public finance is becoming fashionable, especially among the liberal establishment.

Taking these points into consideration, it may make sense to view the American voter as the stockholder of a corporation, concerned more with results than with explanations. A vote contest—like a proxy contest—may not have to rest on a detailed plan by a contender for management to improve the country; it may rest primarily on the record of the current management as against the voter-stockholder perception of what it should have been and the perception of what the contender can and will do in terms of results.

What is suggested here is that the big economic issue for the coming election is the eight-year Nixon-Ford record in contrast to the previous eight-year Democratic record rather than any detailed Democratic economic program. The Democratic case is that results can be better; they were better in the 1960-68 period. In this case a detailed, specific program is less consequential than an expressed desire for and a will to produce a better result. The Kennedy statements that "we've got to get this country moving again" and "a rising tide lifts all the boats" probably had more impact than the platform in 1960.

Operating from a base of fully-employed resources, the American economy should grow at an annual average rate of 4 percent in real terms. The labor force increases about 2 percent a year; the long-term rate of productivity gain seems to run about 2.5 to 3 percent a year. Adding these factors together and allowing for a little slippage yields the 4 percent real growth rate which should be attainable without any appreciable inflation. If the economy is operating at less than capacity, the real growth rate can be higher without inflation.

Take that 4 percent as the standard against which performance is measured (the standard for 1952-60 probably should be a bit lower, say 3.5 percent). The eight Nixon-Ford years, even assuming a 7 percent gain for 1976, will show five below-standard years and an average performance of 65 percent of standard—or about 2.6 percent annual average gain. The Eisenhower years, measured against a 3.5 percent standard, produced an almost identical record. In sharp contrast, the Kennedy-Johnson period showed six of eight years above 4 percent and the 4.8 percent average was 120 percent of standard. The Democratic case in simple form then is: Does a 65 percent record justify retaining the current management? We Democrats have done better in the past and we can do better in the future.

A likely Republican rebuttal would be that they inherited a lot of problems from the Democrats who escalated the Vietnam war, and with their guns-and-butter approach and costly social programs created big budget deficits and sowed the seeds of inflation, and that Democrats got a lot of help on unemployment and output from the war itself.

That case contains some truth but lacks overall credibility. After the Korean war, begun in the Democratic Truman Administration and ended in the Republican Eisenhower Administration, the armed forces dropped from 3.5 million to 2.5 million by the end of 1950 while unemployment rose by 3 million. By the end of 1953, the armed forces were back up to 3.5 million, but unemployment was 2 million less. By the end of 1957, the armed forces were down to 2.2 million while unemployment was up more than 5 million. Both real gross national product and industrial production averaged larger gains from the end of 1950 to the end of 1964 than in the next four years when Vietnam was building up rapidly, and then showed quite small gains in 1969 and 1970, while the war was still big.

It is true that failure to get a solid tax increase until late in the Johnson Administration led to budget deficits that were unhealthy and to upward price pressures. The consumer price index rose 4.8 percent in 1968 against only 1.3 percent in 1964, but it jumped 8.8 percent in 1973 and 12.2 percent in 1974. The Republicans undoubtedly did inherit some problems, but they got worse rather than better the longer they were in power, and only began to be reduced in the last few months.

One point needs to be kept in mind. The American economy at mid-1976 is a lot bigger than in 1952. There are 56 million more people and almost 28 million more jobs. In terms of actual dollars (with the inflation counted in) the G.N.P. is $1.3 trillion bigger; in constant 1972 dollars it is almost $650 billion bigger. Most of the inflation fluff is in the 1968-76 period where about three-fourths of the dollar increase in G.N.P. reflected nothing more than price increases. That same kind of picture is true in the key plant and equipment spending measure, which at mid-1976 was $95 billion more than in 1952. In real terms the gain was less than half of that, and in 1968-76 almost nine-tenths of the increase was in higher prices.

Industrial production, which is measured in physical volume, rose about 139 percent from 1952 through mid-1976. Three-fifths of that gain came between 1960 and 1968. Housing starts, also a physical volume measurement, is a good sample of what a bigger market produces. There actually were 1.2 million more housing starts in the past seven and one-half years than in the previous eight one-half years but the number of starts was significantly larger in 1968 than in 1960 but a little smaller at mid-1976 than in 1968.

The central point that the bulk of the growth in the American economy came between 1960 and 1968. The Nixon-Ford years, even assuming a good 1976, will not show a much better growth record in absolute gains than the Eisenhower years despite the fact that the market base has been much larger.

Thus with respect to jobs, output and investment there would seem to be reason for the voter-stockholder to be less than satisfied. Let's look at the gains of citizens and corporations.

Disposable income per capita is one key measure. It rose by more than $3,900 from 1952 to mid-1976 in actual dollars but less than half that in real dollars. Of the $1,050 gain in the Kennedy-Johnson years more than $800 came through as a real purchasing power gain. Of the $2,500 gain in actual dollars in the last seven and one-half years, less than $700 came through in real purchasing power. Consumer prices rose in each administration but more than seven-tenths of the total rise from 1952 through mid-1976 occurred in the last seven and one-half years.

Corporate profits after tax at mid-1976 were $63 billion more than in 1952 but again less than half that gain was in real dollars and almost all of the increase from 1968 through mid-1976 was in inflation dollars. Actually, the profit figures may well have been worse than that in the last seven and one-half years. The Commerce Department publishes figures on what is called "inventory valuation adjustment" which are used to adjust figures on profits before taxes. In both the Eisenhower and the Kennedy-Johnson years the inventory valuation adjustment averaged about $1 billion a year so that stated profits before tax were not much larger than profits after adjustment for value of inventories. In the last seven and one-half years the inventory valuation adjustment has averaged about $13 billion. In other words, stated corporate profits before tax were almost $13 billion more on the average than was really true even without any allowance for inflation except as related to inventories. The average corporation and its shareholder been very happy about profits the last seven years and it is stand why.

Both profits and general been factors in the malaise in ket. Today, prices are just as as in December 1968, and in past seven and one-half years below that figure.

The slow-growth, low-interest Eisenhower years were investors in stocks. The high of the Kennedy-Johnson Admin higher interest rates and less but apparently these were accor for market prices also ro. The low-growth, high-interest economy of 1968-76 obviously appeal for investors in the stock.

Neither businessmen, farm house builders nor house buy happy about interest rates ov years. Those who loaned fun high rates still found that th tamed enough of an inflation who borrowed paid extraordi for their money and in many locked into those high money time. Thus neither borrowe should be ardent supporters management.

Because of the weak econ it might be expected that budget deficits would be larg the average growth rate in a much different from that of even after adjustment for gr the economy and the inflati budget deficit of the past eig extraordinarily high. And the ness of the balance of pay disappearance of the trade s lowing for the inflation, see light of a weak economy and ation of the dollar against for Viewed in perspective, the of the past seven and one-vulnerable record and the De an economic issue. If that les it would seem most like Democrats stick to their trad approach. That approach need of resources not of finance. If the cities nor the environmen have in conviction and the accomplish more for all the the issue for the general elect by also for those who claim ed.

The Nixon Economics

To the Financial Editor: The article "Nixon's Economic Policies: Return to Hunt the G.O.P." (Aug. 15) is oddly titled. It is the Democrats who are haunted by the return of Nixon's economic policies.

The policies that the article mainly identifies as Nixonian are price and wage controls, and it is the Democrats, not the Republicans, who are flirting with the return of these controls. If the Democrats are not haunted by the fact that these controls did not work here, as they had not worked elsewhere, they should be.

It is found to be ironic that the Democrats are now toying with controls, and "even stronger" than those, like me, who helped run Nixon's controls, are now their strongest critics.

But a review of history will show that there is nothing ironic about the one fact or strange about the other. It has been the Democrats who have leaned towards controls—before, during and after the Nixon Administration—and the Republicans, especially those around Nixon, who opposed them—also before, during and since.

The Democratic Congress enacted standby control authority in 1970, against the

Handbags

To the Financial Editor: In the article "Implications of the Tempest Over Handbags" (July 25) attention was drawn to Secretary of the Treasury William E. Simon's removal of the countervailing duty on leather handbags from Brazil. But the merits of the specific case were dismissed in favor of a discussion of broader foreign policy implications of the Secretary's action. We feel the important issue is precisely the merits of the case.

Imports of $3 million ($20 million at retail) may not appear large in terms of overall United States trade, but the effects are certainly important to the relatively small United States handbag industry which has already lost 45 percent of its market to imports. This has caused many companies to go out of business and has cost thousands of jobs.

Brazil's exports of leather handbags to the United States have increased by over 700 percent since 1972. What makes the situation worse, these handbag exports have been and are continuing to be subsidized by the Brazilian Government, an action which led to the 14 percent countervailing duty imposed by the Treasury, which has been totally removed while Brazil's subsidies continue.

Secretary Simon's action was inconsistent with the intent of Congress and with the countervailing duty provisions of the Trade Act of 1974.

We hope Congress will override Secretary Simon's action. If it doesn't, there is no telling which industry will be next to feel the adverse effect of a United States statute being warped to suit the designs of United States Government officials.

Options

To the Financial Editor: I found the article "The Options Element in Big Board Prices" (Aug. 8) very refreshing, because most of the public discussion of options seems to be "how to" in nature and positive in a marketing sense.

This past week some brokers have been calling customers and suggesting that the customers write options against such "deflated" stocks as Syntex, for example, stressing the "rich" premiums (on an annual basis) and the "downside protection."

Surprisingly few customers appear to be asking about the possibility of a price decline. There, I think, is where the danger lies.

Take Syntex. Based on yesterday's close, and disregarding dividends (which are negligible) and commissions (which are not), the customer would have paid $2,782.50 for the stock and received $100 for the option (Oct. 30).

What would happen if the stock declined to, say 26%? This could lead to a panic buying back of the option and selling the stock. It could

Simplicity Stock Options Too Much for the Judge

During the prolonged bear market of recent years, many executives found themselves unhappily owning worthless stock options. As a result, a flurry of revised stock option plans was noted on the corporate scene...

Judge Pollack said that "there is no sufficient factual justification placed on the record for reducing by $22 the exercise price of the stock options held by the chief executive officer and providing him on the eve of his mandatory retirement with 150,000 options on stock which, within a relatively brief period, showed a paper profit of approximately $1 million as a further incentive to service when he was already taking down $200,000 a year, had obtained as a lump sum pre-retirement pension benefit and enjoyed the secure prospect of a guaranteed $120,000 consultation fee for himself or his estate for 10 years following termination of his active status."

Mr. Shapiro and the other defendants have not indicated, as yet, if they will ask for a trial on the issue.

WASHINGTON REPORT

ning the Government for Shortages administration officials do sit on the 15-man commission (along with four members of Congress and six representatives of the private sector). However, George C. Eads, the commissioner's executive director and a Democrat, rejects the notion of Administration domination.

Second, and this is the point that really interests Mr. Eads, the Government doesn't know enough about what is happening in the complex, sprawling continental economy of the United States, not to mention global markets.

In 1972-74, Mr. Eads recalled, a fertilizer shortage, for example, was commonly blamed on shortages of natural gas. In fact, he said, the principal cause was the Government's release of acreage for grain planting to increase supplies, a release Mr. Eads said was too abrupt.

problem lay in techniques of recovery and cost. Mr. Eads is aware that no one is likely to find provocative a call for more information and analysis.

Mr. Eads reports sympathetically that both a prominent Administration official and a well known political scientist feel that "the Government doesn't want quality analysis," lest the analysts become "a possible center of independent power within government."

Long Party Lines

Contenders Get Time

Traditional Labor Democrats not yet arrived, both Democratic Presidents and their running mates campaigning in ears of their party conventions.

Mr. Ford has proposed restricting each session to a relatively lengthy debate on one policy area. Mr. Carter wants each debate to include a wide range of issues.

Even if the candidates agree on the details, other obstacles may arise. The Federal Election Commission is due to decide next week whether the League of Women Voters would be making an illegal campaign contribution to the candidates by sponsoring the debates, as it has offered to do.

They have both consented in principle. Mr. Ford's eagerness for debate, belief that he is the underdog. (Mr. Ford is developing the strategy of the underdog. Page 5.)

The likelihood that the debates will be held was increased by a meeting last week at which Ford and Carter representatives reported making progress toward an agreement on the timing and the format. Each candidate's position on the latter reflects his estimate of how he will perform best in the televised confrontations.

A Prince Says He Was Wrong

In a statement both graceful and terse, Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands conceded last week that his relationship with the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation had "developed along the wrong lines," necessitating his resignation from virtually all of his military and business positions.

It is not at all certain that the crisis in the Netherlands is over with his resignation. Reports continue to circulate that Queen Juliana, embarrassed by the entire affair and angry with the Government for not exonerating her husband, may eventually abdicate.

The Prince's resignation followed the release of a report by a three-man Government commission established six months ago to investigate allegations that he had accepted from the Lockheed Corporation bribes totaling $1.1 million. While the commission found no evidence that he accepted the bribes, it strongly condemned him for being "tempted to take initiatives which were completely unacceptable," "imprudent," "unwise," and "open to dishonorable requests."

Prince Bernhard will retain his position as Consort to the Queen and the Dutch will still be obliged to address him as "His Royal Highness."

The relative calm with which the disclosures have been taken by the public bespeaks the warm relationship that exists between the monarchy, the elected political leaders and the Dutch people. No one wanted to see the House of Orange fall. It has ruled the Netherlands without interruption for 400 years; the country became a constitutional monarchy in 1814.

This time Attica has been a peaceful episode, but conditions there—and at other prisons in the area—are no better than they were. Page 5.

'Issues' May Get Lost

TV Debates: The Record Is Not Very Promising

By JOSEPH LELYVELD

WASHINGTON—Only a spoilsport would say so, but the enthusiasm that the prospect of Presidential debates arouses among civic leaders, editorial writers and other right-thinking citizens is not always easy to understand. The precedents, such as they are, suggest that this form of political theater has its drawbacks.

Before the electronic era, the outstanding exercise in the form was the Lincoln-Douglas debates, which foreshadowed a Presidential race but actually had to do with a Senate seat. The judgment of posterity was that Lincoln had the best of the debates, but it was Douglas who went to the Senate.

The only precedent of any real relevance to the promised round of encounters between President Ford and Jimmy Carter is obviously the so-called "great debates" that the television networks staged for John Kennedy and Richard Nixon in 1960. According to the folklore that has grown up around the debates, Mr. Kennedy went to the White House because his opponent refused professional makeup before the first of the four debates.

Actually, social scientists who flocked to study the public reaction to the debates have themselves been debating, ever since, the unanswerable question whether the encounters on TV decided the outcome, or merely gave wavering voters rationalizations for decisions they would have made anyhow.

In any case, if the object of the exercise is to debate "the real issues," as Mr. Ford has promised to do with Jimmy Carter, the example of 1960 is not very encouraging. It is not simply that the issues that emerged—whether American "prestige" was up or down, or whether the islets of Quemoy and Matsu were worth a war—seem even more specious, viewed retrospectively, than they seemed at the time. It is that the debates—if they can be called debates—focused on issues only fleetingly.

To the media sage Marshall McLuhan, it was evident that the essential difference that showed up on the tube between the two candidates was one of "image." Mr. Nixon was too well defined, Mr. McLuhan wrote; he left nothing to the imagination. With Mr. Kennedy, it was just the opposite—his "blurry, shaggy texture" conveyed a sense of excitement and possibilities that reached beyond the formulas and slogans ("We must get America moving again") in which, mostly, he expressed himself.

It was only in the first encounter that Mr. Kennedy seemed a clear victor, and even there it was perceived that his edge had little to do with the substance of his argument. From the start, he realized that he did not need to engage his rival in the point-by-point disputation of a traditional debate or even respond directly to the random questions put to the candidates by the panel of newsmen drawn mostly from the networks. Overriding the format, he spoke directly to the TV audience.

Mr. Nixon, who was almost deferential in the first exchanges, learned this trick too. His boast about the defeat of Communism in Indochina and his sermonette on the importance of clean speech in the White House now sound hollow, even grotesque, in the light shed retrospectively by the long war and the Watergate tapes. But he performed well, better than is commonly recalled; although he fell slightly in the polls after the first encounter, he was by no means knocked out of the race.

The Candidates' Show

At this distance, it is the production history of the "great debates" that seems most instructive. The television consultants of the candidates had their say on every detail of lighting and camera angles, realizing even before the first meeting that this was show biz more than an exchange of ideas. Basically, it was the campaigns rather than the networks that shaped and produced the debates.

Last week, when representatives of President Ford and Mr. Carter had their first negotiating session on the debates that are supposed to start next month, the same process was being repeated, with one important exception: The networks were barred from the discussions because Congress had not moved, as it did in 1960, to suspend the equal-time provision of the Federal Communications Act.

The provision, known as Section 315, is supposed to guarantee third-party, independent and minor candidates the same access to free air time, outside the normal news programs, as the two major candidates get. In practice it does nothing to get nonconforming views on the air, but it does foreclose special political programming.

To get around Section 315, the Federal Communications Commission ruled last fall that debates between the two major candidates could be televised if they were staged by someone other than the networks, if they were held outside television studios, and if they were broadcast in their entirety. The nonpartisan League of Women Voters has taken the initiative in sponsoring this fall's debates, a development that may tend to limit, if not eliminate, the over-involvement of the campaign staffs in the production of the debates as TV shows.

Nothing can guarantee, of course, that the debates will focus on the "real issues" or that either of this year's candidates will match the performances or glibness of their precursors of 1960. But for that crucial minority of voters—fewer, probably, than two of ten—that still regards itself as undecided, it will be by far the best opportunity of the campaign to take the measure of the two candidates.

It's probably wrong, both as a matter of practical politics and healthy democratic practice, to regard the debates as a sudden-death playoff. But with all that has been said about how turned-off the voters are, good ratings on this TV show will be a sign, at least, that the viewers think the choice between the candidates matters.

Kennedy-Nixon, 1960

The debates between John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon in 1960, not always models of clarity or profundity, nevertheless gripped national attention. To refresh the memory, and perhaps as a portent for 1976, here are some of the things the candidates had to say.

Support for Farmers

Kennedy: Well, Nixon, I have the Federal Government, I have the Federal Government, I have the Federal Government, I have the Federal Government, I have the Federal Government.

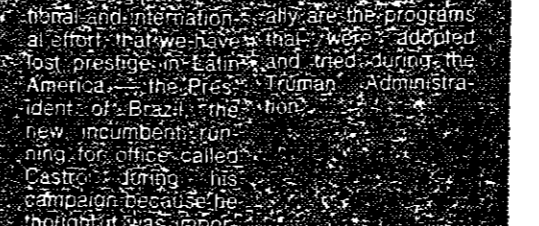

Relations With Congress

Kennedy: I think that Nixon's record in Congress is a record of failure. He has not done anything to help the people of this country.

The National Thrust

Kennedy: I believe that the American people are entitled to a President who will lead them to a better future.

Formosa, Quemoy and Matsu

Kennedy: I believe that the United States has a duty to defend Formosa, Quemoy and Matsu.

America's Prestige

Nixon: America's prestige is at stake. We must show the world that we are a great and powerful nation.

China's Role

Kennedy: I believe that the United States should take a more active role in the affairs of the world.

Nixon: I believe that the United States should take a more active role in the affairs of the world.

Shaky House of Orange

The Royal Example of Lockheed's Style

By BERNARD WEINRAUB

THE HAGUE—It began in the early 1960's when Lockheed Aircraft Corporation offered a Jetstar to Prince Bernhard to cement the company's ties in the Netherlands. It developed when the German-born Prince received $100,000, and possibly far more, to spend on unnamed "acquaintances."

By last week, with revelations by a Government inquiry that accused him of being open to "dishonorable requests and offers," Prince Bernhard's career was in shambles, the Dutch Royal House was disgraced and in disarray and the Dutch public seemed alternately fascinated, repelled and deeply embarrassed that their highly popular monarchy had been humiliated.

Perhaps more important, the devastating criticism of Prince Bernhard by the three-member commission pointed up not only the surprising depth of his involvement with Lockheed, but also the interlocking tangle of bribes, lies and piles of floating money that marked Lockheed's dealings and dealings in the Netherlands as well as Japan, Italy, West Germany and the Middle East.

One member of the investigating panel, whom the Dutch called "the three wise men," told a friend several weeks ago that, after listening to witnesses in Washington, The Hague, Geneva and elsewhere, the panel was simply stunned at the web of business intrigues shrouding Lockheed's operations.

A Victim of Self-Deception

Like the former Japanese Prime Minister, Kakuei Tanaka, who was arrested two weeks ago and charged with receiving a bribe of $1.6 million, Prince Bernhard seems, according to people who know him, a victim of self-deception, greed, naiveté and arrogance. "He thought he was a 19th-century Prince, that he could do whatever he wanted, that he was above the law," said an associate of Prime Minister Joop den Uyl.

The Lockheed bribery scandal has had deep political implications around the world, notably in Japan and Italy as well as the Netherlands, since a United States Senate subcommittee on multinational corporations released documents last February that Lockheed had paid out $24.4 million to facilitate sales of its planes. In Japan, at least $12.6 million in payments were made, and 18 former Government officials and top business leaders have been indicted. In Italy, the documents indicated, one of three prime ministers in office from 1968 to 1970—Giovanni Leone, Aldo Moro or Mariano Rumor—may have received payoffs.

Some Dutch officials and journalists attribute the Prince's plunge into the murky Lockheed waters to his restlessness, his long-standing friendships in the international jet set, his tireless traveling with its thinly veiled implication that he considers the Dutch too plodding and earnest for his tastes. But whatever the reasons, the relationship that developed between Prince Bernhard and Lockheed serves to detail vividly the methods used by the company to give millions of dollars in payoffs to public officials.

Initially, Lockheed's management sought to offer the Prince a Jetstar for his personal use, but the plan was rejected as impractical. It was then decided to offer him more than $1 million, partly to insure his friendship, partly to smooth the way for the Netherlands to buy Lockheed Starfighter jets.

No evidence was found that Prince Bernhard actually received the money, although Lockheed apparently made large payments over several years through middlemen. Among them was an elderly Czarist prince, now dead, who was a good friend of Prince Bernhard's mother; and Fred C. Meuser, a Swiss-based Lockheed official and wartime friend. Prince Bernhard himself indicated to the investigating panel that Lockheed did not intend the money for him but actually for Mr. Meuser, to remove some personal grievances against the company. "The prince's interpretation," the panel said, "cannot be reconciled with established facts."

Whoever received the money—and there are many now in The Hague who believe that the Prince has deposited some of it away—the relationship rapidly developed.

Perhaps the most astonishing allegation about the Prince's relations with Lockheed was that in 1974 he sent a letter to Lockheed asking the company to quietly appoint him as an agent. He said he wanted to earn 4 percent commission for the purchase of Lockheed aircraft, and 8 percent commission for spare parts.

Lockheed officials were stunned at the request. The rate suggested would amount to a total of $4 million to $6 million. When Prince Bernhard heard that the commission would be so large, according to the panel, he demurred and said he had only $1 million in mind.

The purchase of the aircraft was eventually removed from the Netherlands' budget, and Prince Bernhard failed to receive the commission. It was, the panel said tersely, an improper request. The inquiry's findings seem to have a ripple impact in other countries: West Germany said it hoped to arrange to have its Justice Ministry have access to United States Justice Department records concerning Lockheed bribes. Japan and Italy were continuing full-scale probes. In the Netherlands, however, the inquiry which brought disgrace to Prince Bernhard seemed to serve as a finale to the Lockheed drama. Although there are further questions, may Dutch citizens simply did not war to hear them.

ada: More ake Than Language

By ROBERT TRUMBULL

French-speaking air-traffic controllers of announced on Thursday that they will seek as a separate aviation union, breaking with the Canadian Air Traffic Control Union, the national union with a majority of members. The Quebec controllers have enlisted the support of larger French-speaking unions, including the militant Quebec Teachers' Union, in a series of confrontations that, in the words of Prime Minister Trudeau, have raised serious issues of "national diversity in Canada, with the French fraction of the population, is the most overt expression of the cultural cleavage between the French-speaking settlers, who were the first white and their English conquerors. Under the language, the French-speaking community to preserve Gallic culture in Canada against the pressure of English. Facing superior economic forces, and steadily losing in numbers for various reasons, including a declining birth rate in Quebec, the French Canadians see themselves as "a French island in an English sea."

Unless checked, according to Mr. Trudeau, the language dispute could lead to the departure of French-speaking Quebec from the Canadian Federation, or at least greatly encourage the long-standing independence movement by Quebec separatists, a growing minority in Canada's largest province.

In Quebec, if nowhere else in Canada, the French have more than held their own in cultural fields. The French language theater thrives in the province, which includes Canada's most populous city of Montreal, as do French television, radio, books, magazines, newspapers and movie industry that far outstrips its English-language rival. Language is the life, as well as the symbol, of the French struggle. Prime Minister Trudeau, a Montrealer, came to power in 1968 on a pledge to enforce bilingualism in public service. French political power in Ottawa is immense, with 74 Quebec seats in a Parliament of 284 members.

Central to the conflict is the "English backlash." In most of the country where French is seldom if ever heard, the indignant cry of many English-speaking Canadians is that French is being "rammed down our throats." Resentments are exacerbated by linguistic anomalies. There is a critical shortage of English-speaking nurses in Montreal because English-speaking applicants cannot pass the French language test required to practice the profession there.

Prime Minister Trudeau was only the third Prime Minister from French Canada in a century. Understanding the relation of the linguistic question to Quebec separatism, he pushed through the official language act of 1969, which guaranteed equality of French and English in federal institutions. But the act, intended to reassure the French, generated additional resentment among the English. People in English-speaking communities ridiculed the regulations requiring labels in French as well as English on the stocks in their stores. English-speaking civil servants resented having to study French, even though at Government expense, if they hoped to reach the upper levels in federal employment.

Around the same time, Premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec, who viewed the soothing of French Canadians on the language issue as a way of diffusing the separatist appeal, pressed through a law making French the only official language of the province. This aroused intense hostility among the English-speaking Quebecers, who are now forbidden to use their own language in business with the Government.

At the same time French Canadians were inflamed by the slighting of their language on the local levels in predominantly English-speaking provinces such as Ontario. A university professor in Ottawa refused to register his child for a birth certificate issued in English only. A number of French Canadians went to jail for a day or two rather than pay fines for minor traffic citations issued in English. Any incident which disparaged a French Canadian — such as the series of recent scandals implicating cabinet members with French names — might be interpreted as evidence of an anti-French plot. Many English Canadians chafed over what they perceived to be the emergence of "French power" in Ottawa under Mr. Trudeau, whose closest associates in the cabinet also happen to be Quebecers.

Meanwhile the Parti Quebecois, which advocates independence for Quebec, appeared to be gaining strength. It won 30 percent of the popular vote in the last Quebec election, a substantial gain, and analysts believe it would do even better today.

The roots of the conflict go back to old rivalries in Canada between Britain and France. Britain won the territorial struggle more than two centuries ago in a climactic battle on the Plains of Abraham, now a Quebec City park and tourist attraction. With the debacle on the Plains of Abraham, the French aristocrats and wealthy entrepreneurs went back to France with the defeated troops. The former French Canada was left peopled mostly by peasants.

The bulk of French Canadians drifted into lower occupations and tended to congregate in French-speaking ghettos. Class barriers arose between the two communities and the situation reached a crisis point during World War II when French Canadians objected to being drafted to fight alongside British Canadians. William Lyon Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister at the time, declared in his recently published wartime diaries that the country had been on the verge of civil war when the victory in Europe ended the episode.

In this charged atmosphere, the organized airline pilots and the air traffic controllers refuse to countenance a broader use of French in Quebec airports, beyond the five small ones where it is already in use, on grounds of safety. A strike last month by the controllers was halted by an injunction. The pilots, ignoring a similar court action, refused to fly for nine days.

The controversy swiftly burst through the parameters of an aviation safety discussion. The two sides exchanged accusations of "bigotry" and "racism" in the newspapers, on television and in the radio open line shows across the country on a scale that Mr. Trudeau says is unprecedented in his experience. Not the least of Mr. Trudeau's concerns is the possibility of having to fight an election on the question of bilingualism within the next two years, and the risk of generating further heat between the two groups.

Disdain for Giscard

The Chirac Departure Was Both Political And Personal

By FLORA LEWIS

PARIS—When Valéry Giscard d'Estaing decided to face down ex-Premier Jacques Chaban-Delmas, in the spring of 1974, and to seek to become the French Fifth Republic's first non-Gaullist President, the political hatchet man who chopped down Chaban-Delmas's Gaullist base was Jacques Chirac.

Mr. Chirac (who last week split with President Giscard d'Estaing by resigning as Prime Minister) was then not quite 42. He was the aggressive, ambitious Interior Minister in the late President Georges Pompidou's last government, in which Mr. Giscard d'Estaing also served, as Minister of Finance. There were rumors that Mr. Pompidou was preparing Mr. Chirac to succeed him but the ailing President died in office without being able to dictate future leadership. Mr. Chirac was still too young, too little known, to push a claim of his own to the presidency at that time.

So he rallied to Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's candidacy. With a series of behind-the-scenes maneuvers which still remain partly secret, he swung an important part of Gaullist support away from Mr. Chaban-Delmas. That, plus Mr. Chaban-Delmas's inept and ineffective campaign, gave Mr. Giscard d'Estaing a smashing first-round victory and made him the defender of the regime against a powerful challenge from Socialist leader François Mitterrand, the candidate of the opposition Socialist-Communist alliance.

In the second round, Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's somewhat American-style campaign, pledging "change within continuity," reforms, youth, vigor without upheaval, narrowly outdistanced the Left. He owed a lot to Jacques Chirac.

But it was politics, not gratitude, that led Mr. Giscard d'Estaing to appoint Mr. Chirac his Prime Minister. The Gaullists were still the largest bloc in the National Assembly. Mr. Chirac had infuriated a number of Gaullists and been called a "traitor" for helping to take the Elysee away from their party. The party was in a shambles. It appeared that Mr. Giscard d'Estaing expected Mr. Chirac to split it, shucking off the orthodox and the unbudgetable right wing, and bringing the rest along into some new party or group to be merged with President Giscard d'Estaing's Independent Republicans, Centrists and others. That would have been a profound reversal of French politics. Under de Gaulle's Fifth Republic, the country had been polarized between Gaullists and Communists, leaving only shreds in between. Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's hope was to create and seize the leadership of the broad middle, leaving only fringes on the Left and Right.

Mr. Chirac expressed no audible objection. But the strategy was foiled from the start by Mr. Mitterrand's success in keeping the uneasy Communist-Socialist alliance together, and drawing moderate leftists and independents yearning for change into a revived Socialist Party.

In any case, Mr. Chirac set out quickly to rebuild the Gaullists and to make the shattered party into his own power base. It turned out not to be as difficult as it looked at first. Without DeGaulle or even his associate and successor, Mr. Pompidou, the Gaullists were a motley group with a good organizational base but little more than nostalgia to guide them. It took Jacques Chirac only six months to persuade them it was better to put control in his hands—and as Prime Minister he had patronage to offer—than to nurse grievances. By the end of the year, the Gaullists were back together as a political force, grumbling when Mr. Giscard d'Estaing moved policies away from their custom but glad enough to see Mr. Chirac as the new strong man of the faith who kept things from moving too far.

In the first period of President Giscard d'Estaing's rule, Mr. Chirac kept a low profile on policy, tending to his partisan fences and leaving the limelight—with both its credit and blame—to the delighted new President. Then gradually, almost imperceptibly, Mr. Chirac established himself as the Government's practical and parliamentary leader.

The habits and personalities of the President and his former Prime Minister are vastly different. The President is relaxed, elegant, given to urbane pleasures and much concerned with keeping a modern, attractive public image. Mr. Chirac is a hard-driving compulsive tautly-organized worker, concerned primarily with exercising the machinery of power. That produced some tension behind the scenes, but it seemed to be a complementary division of labor.

If differences appeared on foreign affairs, on economic affairs, on military planning, they seemed only matters of wording. The change came suddenly, directly as a result of the Government's substantial setback in nationwide cantonal elections last spring. The cantonal results confirmed the polls showing of a large enough voter shift to the left to reverse the legislative majority in crucial parliamentary elections the spring of 1978. Mr. Chirac made up his mind that the whole Government strategy had to be changed. He urged the President to jettison the whole idea of reform, centrism, "change," to concentrate on rallying the people who have voted for him in the past.

President Giscard d'Estaing rejected the argument, and a series of smaller but similarly divisive and jarring disagreements followed that major one. It did not help that all along the President kept talking about more reforms, about "government from the center," about "reconciling Frenchmen." Mr. Chirac wanted to lay down a barrage against the left.

By July, Mr. Chirac came to the conviction that the Government's only chance of keeping control of Parliament was to abandon the Giscard line, spring a surprise election this fall, and force a unified campaign instead of allowing the coalition parties to elbow each other for better positions in the first round. The President refused. Mr. Chirac submitted his resignation secretly on July 26, but agreed with the President's request that it be delayed until the second half of August. Mr. Chirac's letter of reply contained the formal phrases of courtesy to the President, but it coldly promised to keep the Government going until his "return." That obviously reflected Mr. Chirac's disdain for a leader he privately came to consider lazy and flighty. Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's "return" in the second half of August was from a fortnight's safari vacation in Zaire.

The personal and political conflict was the heart of the matter, not substantive policies. By stepping out, he had placed himself in a position to pick up the pieces on the right if the left does win the parliamentary elections, or even to challenge for the presidency in 1981 whether or not the President stumbles in the tough years ahead.

Mr. Chirac can be expected to support the coalition against the left, and even to fight hard in the coming campaigns. But basically, Mr. Chirac has pitted his assessment of how to keep the current Government in power against Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's view of how to win a new and larger power base. President Giscard d'Estaing did win the presidential campaign on his own strategy, but it was with Jacques Chirac's politicking to back him up. Now that they have parted ways, the voters will be the test of their conflicting judgments.

Missinger Will Visit the U.N. This Week, but the Conference Is Unlikely to Budge

Searches for the Sea Remain as Elusive as Ever

By PAUL HOFMANN

ONS, N. Y.—Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger came to New York this week to try to break the stalemate in the Law of the Sea Conference. It is doubtful he will succeed, mainly because there appears to have become hopelessly entangled among competing ideological and interest groups, probably the biggest global bargain-holding, has passed the halfway point of its 1973. Disagreements over the crucial for mining have led to the stalemate. They what the conference is really all about—the oceans as the planet Earth's last frontier, to share, or redistribute, their riches.

of what is going on recall the colonial European powers, from the age of the early part of this century. During that Spain, France, Britain and the Netherlands, and Italy, were vying to carve up other insatiable quest of gold, spices, tributes, and military bases.

once-colonized countries are independent, and of the world are competing for slices of riches from the marine depths. The marine resources. Already, the sea—navigation, fisheries and gas fields—yields almost $100 billion a year. In the next few decades the figure rises as new technology permits nations to drill in hitherto unattainable nine hard minerals from the ocean abysses. Wealth of billions of tons of nickel, copper is contained in potato-sized spongy chunks, that litter the ocean floor at depths of beyond.

Beyond the expected rhetoric, the following major alignments are discernible at the Law of the Sea Conference:

• The coalition of developing nations. This caucus of about 110 countries, still called the Group of 77, is more or less united in the issue of deep-sea mining, but deeply divided by a rift between countries with no or little access to the sea and coastal nations. The developing nations cling to the United Nations tenet that the riches of the ocean floor are "the common heritage of mankind," and demand that all activities to exploit them be supervised by a new international agency.

Control of the Seabeds

A compromise with the industrial nations, which have the technology and capital to mine the deep seabed, seemed possible earlier this year. But it broke down last week, thus precipitating Mr. Kissinger's 11th-hour attempt to save the negotiations. At issue is a demand by the developing nations that exploration of the deep seabed be placed in the hands of an international authority which the developing countries, by their mere numbers, would control.

• The industrial nations. They reject the proposed internationalization of seabed mining as unrealistic, arguing that they would have to provide technology, skilled manpower and capital, whereas the developing countries would dominate the future agency and reap most of the benefits. These benefits may not be inconsequential. By the early 1980s an entirely new industry involving billions of dollars may flourish—with or without the blessing of the United Nations or the Group of 77.

• Landlocked and "geographically disadvantaged" countries. This is a new militant alliance of 52 nations fighting against what they term maritime privilege. The grouping cuts through long-rigid ideological lineups.

Such unlikely partners as Switzerland and Uganda, Singapore and Poland, East Germany and West Germany have joined forces to win a piece of the marine action. Landlocked states want neighboring coastal countries to grant them transit rights over land, and special privileges in their 200-mile exclusive economic offshore zones. Nations with brief shorelines also want favored treatment in waters controlled by nearby coastal states.

• Coastal states claiming exclusive economic zones. This group, now counting more than 70 members, includes Australia, Canada, Mexico and Norway.

The new legal concept of an exclusive economic sea zone is almost generally accepted, but has not yet been clearly defined. As things stand now, there is consensus that the territorial sea immediately adjoining the shoreline will be broadened from three miles—the range of a 17th-century cannon ball—to 12 miles. Each coastal state has full sovereignty in this strip.

The exclusive economic zone would add a sea area 188 miles wide, its outer limit 200 miles distant from the shoreline. Coastal states would have exclusive rights to exploit living resources—fish—and seabed minerals in these margins. Some coastal nations have already proclaimed their own 200-mile zones unilaterally. The United States, by an act due to go into effect next March, has established a 200-mile fishing zone.

• The big maritime powers. They are principally the United States, the Soviet Union and Japan. They have global military and economic interests that result in unconfessed tactical alliances at the sea-law conference. For instance, both the United States and the Soviet Union insist that their ships must enjoy free passage through such international waterways as Gibraltar and the Malacca Straits. The big maritime nations also keep pressing for free scientific research within the 200-mile zones of other countries.

Less powerful coastal states are voicing fears that scientific research projects by outsiders may provide cover for clandestine military or economic activities.

The Nation

In Summary

Rights Panel Is Critical of Ford on Schools

The United States Civil Rights Commission has issued a lengthy report on school desegregation that is generally positive on progress but strongly critical of the Ford Administration. The burden of the commission's findings was that desegregation works peacefully where communities and community leaders want it to; Mr. Ford's legislative proposals to limit the Federal judiciary's busing authority, the commission said, encourages community resistance.

The observations of the Presidentially appointed commission have no legal force. Mr. Ford has limited his comment on the report to a reiteration that Justice Department and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare have been following the law in desegregation cases.

Local officials and community figures in Boston, where racial tensions and outbreaks of violence have been continuous since a Federal judge ordered busing for school desegregation two years ago, and in Louisville, where a plan implemented last year was initially failed, were cited as examples of failed leadership. Mr. Ford last May directed Attorney General Edward H. Levi to select a suitable case in which to argue before the United States Supreme Court that busing orders should be more restricted in scope, Boston was considered.

The commission said its findings suggest that peaceful desegregation raises educational quality and minority achievement, but not without its costs to the groups it is intended to help. Nonwhite children, it found, are bused farther and longer than white children, and minority teachers are laid off in disproportionate numbers in reorganized school districts.

Three thousand school districts are under court order to desegregate, or are implementing voluntary plans. One of those districts is Dallas. The school year opened there last week without incident under an extensive "tri-racial" plan in which 18,000 pupils in grades 4 through 8 were bused. The district has an enrollment of 140,000; 44 percent of the students are white, 44 percent black and 12 percent Mexican-American. Omaha, Milwaukee, St. Louis and Dayton are expected to open under new plans next month.

Auto Unions Pick a Target

Following its customary practice, the United Automobile Workers Union has decided to concentrate its bargaining efforts on one of the Big Three car manufacturers to try to reach a settlement that will influence talks with the other two. This year's target, the Ford Motor Company, was apparently selected in part because the union believes it will be the manufacturer most amenable to some of the union's key demands.

The union's strategy is to force the target company to settle first by threatening to strike it alone when the industry's 3-year contract expires on Sept. 14; that would put Ford at a competitive disadvantage with the General Motors Corporation and the Chrysler Corporation at the beginning of the model year, a critical time for sales. Normally, the agreement reached with the target company becomes a model for agreements with the other companies.

Ford had been the expected target because it had not been singled out since 1967. Moreover, the union evidently believes that the Ford managers are most likely to agree to its request for an increase in supplemental unemployment benefits for laid-off workers and a promise not to oppose unionization efforts at new plants. The union was said to have ruled out Chrysler as a target because of fears that a strike might seriously damage the company's viability and General Motors because it had proved resistant in bargaining so far.

The Senate's Vote on Abortion

The extent to which the issue of abortion has assumed political force is reflected once again in a Senate vote to reject legislation to forbid the use of Federal money for abortions. Though the vote against was 53 to 35, a majority of the Senators up for reelection this year voted for the measure.

Abortion, in recent elections, has begun to play the role that gun control, busing and other issues did in the sixties, as a small but growing number of organized and vociferous people have been able to mobilize a one-issue constituency. Local right-to-life committees were often powers to be contended with in this season's Presidential primaries.

The measure the Senate rejected was an amendment attached by the House to the $57 billion appropriations bill for the Departments of Labor and Health, Education and Welfare, and other agencies. Its primary effect would be to prevent poor women from obtaining abortions under Medicaid; last year a quarter of a million women had abortions under the program, at a cost to the Government of $50 million. Opponents of the measure have argued that it discriminates against the poor; proponents, that the Government should not participate in what they consider an immoral act.

The amendment has provided Congress with the only opportunity to go on record on abortion this year, and Senate and House have been deadlocked on the issue all summer. A House-Senate conference committee could reach no agreement and returned the appropriations bill to the respective houses. Because the House last month, voted 223 to 150 to retain the anti-abortion amendment, the bill has been returned to conference.

A Growing Trade Deficit

Analysis both in and out of Government saw a mostly good thing last week in a statistic that is popularly considered a bad thing. The United States trade deficit in July was the largest in almost two years, but the analysts say the figure demonstrates again that the American economy has recovered from the recent recession faster than the economies of other industrial nations. Some economists were more cautious, however, about what may be the longer term implications of the present trade profile.

Imports had been expected to rise, and last year's record surplus diminished, as recovery progressed and domestic demand increased. Last month, imports of all goods exceeded exports by $827.1 million, bringing the deficit for the first seven months of 1976 to $1.88 billion, and the Commerce Department's projection for the full year's trade deficit to $3.2 billion. That would be the second highest deficit on record after 1972's $6.4 billion; it could mean that the dollar will weaken in international money markets. American goods would then be cheaper for buyers abroad, but concomitantly, the price of imports would rise at home, and inflationary pressure would increase. A primary factor increasing July's import total was oil, up $527.3 million from June and reflecting a year-long trend. The volume of imported oil has grown almost 20 percent since January. The United States is now more dependent on foreign oil than ever.

Daniel Schorr Is Subpoenaed

In voting last week to subpoena Daniel Schorr, a television reporter, and three other journalists, the House ethics committee has moved one step closer to confrontation involving the powers of Congress and the constitutional right of freedom of the press.

The committee is investigating the circumstances under which portions of a report on intelligence activities came to be published despite a House vote to keep it secret. Mr. Schorr, who supplied The Village Voice with a copy of a draft of the report that it published last February, has declined to disclose his source to committee investigators, on the ground that the First Amendment permits a newsman to keep his sources confidential.

The committee voted 8 to 4 to subpoena the journalists after five months of inquiry during which more than 400 persons have been questioned. Though it had been widely believed that the investigation would be quietly dropped for lack of evidence, some committee members apparently felt that to uphold the honor of the House Mr. Schorr should be questioned formally.

How far the committee is willing to go is not clear. Mr. Schorr could be held in contempt if he refuses to say who gave him the report. CBS Television, Mr. Schorr's employer, has relieved him of his duties until the investigation is completed.

Labor Talks Are Under Way; the Outlook Is Distinctly Iffy.

Car Industry Is Still Economy's Bellwether

By A. H. RASKIN

Through most of the three decades since World War II, model changes in national collective bargaining have borne the same "made in Detroit" stamp as have model changes in automobiles. The wage patterns set in negotiations between the United Auto Workers and the Big Three auto companies have percolated through the economy, fixing pay increases for millions of workers and helping to determine the pace of inflation.

That multiplier effect explains why anxiety about a renewed national wage-price spiral and a dampening of economic recovery was stirred by two Detroit developments last week. One was the union's announcement that the Ford Motor Company would be its strike target in this year's negotiations. The other was the General Motors Corporation's notice (expected to be followed soon by Ford and Chrysler) that the average price of its new cars will be raised by 5.9 percent, with a further boost likely if the cost of labor peace proves high.

Until the last few weeks, most observers had been relatively relaxed about the danger of either a protracted strike when contracts expire Sept. 14 or an expensive settlement in this pivotal industry.

One basis for optimism was that no union had done a better job of protecting its members against erosion of their take-home pay by the steep climb of living costs in the last three years.

The degree to which the auto union's past gains have given its members a preferred position nationally has been underscored by the fact that all the major bargaining in the first half of 1976 centered on attempts by other powerful unions to catch up with the auto workers. The uncapped cost-of-living escalator in auto's 1973 agreements has brought the 600,000 hourly workers in the Big Three direct pay increases of $1.09 an hour. The escalator payments brought average straight time earnings to a current level of $6.88, nearly 50 percent above the general factory level. Shift premiums, overtime vacations, pensions, health insurance and other payroll outlays put the total labor cost to the companies at $11.37 an hour.

The International Brotherhood of Teamsters, which tied up over the road trucking for three days last April before settling for a 32 percent increase over three years, was spurred mostly by the gap between the 22 cents an hour it got under the limited escalator in its 1973 pact and payments five times that big racked up by auto workers. It took a four-month strike by the 60,000 members of the United Rubber Workers, whose 1973 agreements with the Big Four Tire Companies contained no cost-of-living cushion at all, before Federal intervention brought a basic economic accord that will give the strikers wage increases of $1.35 an hour, or 36 percent, over the next three years.

Another cause for hope has been that no industry was hit harder by the recession than auto, and none has made a sharper recovery. Fully a third of the union's members were jobless for months in 1974 and 1975, and the supplemental unemployment benefit funds designed to guarantee idle workers almost 95 percent of their take-home pay ran out at General Motors and Chrysler. With many bills still unpaid, the recently unemployed are not eager to take to the picket line and subsist on strike benefits of $40 to $50 a week.

The companies also have a big stake in maintaining uninterrupted production at the start of their 1977 model year. Demand for domestic cars has picked up so dramatically that Thomas A. Mur, chairman, coupled his announcement of a forecast that auto and truck of the coming 12 months will exceed the 14.6-million vehicles. Ford, as the target, is particularly vulnerable to a tie of the market against the new line of cars being introduced by G. M., the industry.

Normally, all these factors would assure conducive to an agreement without a strike, but the union has been low key in the bargaining table. Most of its effort has been on restructuring the supplemental benefit fund to guard against a rise in the shortfalls that denied payments to especially those who were at the tail end of the lay-off list because they had most spent the usual laundry list of other demands one to start moving toward a shorter through some such device as giving one extra day off a month with pay.

Nothing in that program would be worrisome even now, were it not for the pressures put on the union negotiating industry's spectacular rise in profitability and Chrysler all reported record earnings second quarter. The profits spurt, the steady round of price increases and the forecast future sales have combined to lift the union on how much will be enough when the strike deadline arrives, and that same will make it harder for the rank and file that the huge increase just won by the strikers was a catch-up with auto, not a by-product of new high ground.

But many observers still feel that remains strong that there will be no month and no sharp upward kick of the spiral, for political if not economic reasons is the last time around for Leonard Woodcock auto union president. He must retire next year, and is not eager to end his a crippling strike. That reluctance is the fact that Mr. Woodcock was in the of labor support for Jimmy Carter and that an auto walkout in mid-September would be no boost for the Democratic Mr. Woodcock is widely believed to be a post-nominee for Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

"Unless the industry takes us for granted forces a showdown, there is nothing out can't be solved peacefully," says a negotiator.

The Ranks Don't Seem to Mind; They're Getting Theirs

Corruption, a Fact of Teamster Life

By LEE DEMBART

For two decades the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the largest trade union in the world, has been the object of charges of corruption and the target of government investigations. The union, which represents 2 million of the 18 million organized workers in the country, was expelled from the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations because of its refusal to clean itself up.

Two of the last three teamster presidents, Dave Beck and James R. Hoffa, were sent to prison, as were a host of lesser potentates. But even the successful Federal and local prosecutions seem to have little long-range effect, and there are cynics who say that the current round of investigations by the Labor and Justice Departments and the Internal Revenue Service will not either. While there are many decent, honest, hard-working officials in the teamsters, observers say, corruption appears to be endemic.

In the public mind, the teamsters are a world apart. The perception is partly accurate and partly inaccurate. Although a sizable catalogue of exceptions can be compiled—notably, but not exclusively, among the building trades, American unions are basically honest, at least as far as is known. And it would be a rare union indeed that did not have some business agents or shop stewards who were cozy with management than they ought to be. But while the teamsters have no monopoly on skulduggery, they do take the prize.

The reasons are complex. Some are unique to the trucking industry, which still accounts for a substantial chunk of teamster membership, and some relate to the values of American society. Many of the practices that the teamsters are excoriated for are standard operating procedure in business. A corporation executive who earns a great deal of money is viewed as successful, but it is somehow unseemly for the teamsters' president, Frank E. Fitzsimmons, to be paid $156,250 a year.

"The doctor who drives up in a Cadillac must be a good doctor," says a New York lawyer who represents teamsters but is critical of their leadership. "The trade union leader who shows up in a Cadillac must be a successful man under our ethos. Why is there one standard for Fitzsimmons and another for corporations that bribe the Japanese? Why should the average businessman expect that Fitz do anything better than he does?"

In part, the answer is that the labor movement is often thought of as an ideological movement it often was in the thirties and earlier, committed to social betterment and high ideals. But the rubric does not apply to the teamsters—or many other unions for that matter. They are business unionists, and their business is representing workers.

Last May, the Professional Drivers Council, a teamster watchdog group that claims 2,000 teamsters as members, issued a report that detailed excessive salaries, multiple salaries, unlimited expense accounts and other financial irregularities of teamster international and local officers.

Does this constitute corruption? It appears to be a form of legal skimming. The workers pay dues and teamster leaders live well on those dues. That may be an abuse of something, but it is hard to say of what, especially because the workers themselves don't seem to object much.

As the teamster lawyer states it: "The attitude of most workers toward Mr. Hoffa was the same as the attitude of the people of New York toward Mayor Walker: We're getting ours and he's getting his." But then there is the kind of corruption about which there is no problem of definition, the payoffs, the sweetheart contracts, the paper locals, the shake-downs, and now, with the Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund, the "loans" to mobsters, excessive fenders' fees and kickbacks that led to the current investigations. Last week, the Internal Revenue Service postponed the part of its recent revocation of the fund's tax-exempt status that would have made employers contributions to the fund taxable. Because of its questionable practices, the fund itself is now taxed on its income.

The basis for much of that clearer kind of corruption is in the trucking industry itself. It is a highly competitive industry made up of many small employers for whom a few cents here and there can be the difference between profit and loss.

There is a terrific temptation to buy favors.

"You cannot stockpile trucking like you pile rubber or steel," says Arthur L. Fox, oil's executive director. "Twenty-four hours they go on strike, the employers are hurt. Trucking is an industry where the organ has had influence since the twenties and '30s."

The man who brought the enormous teamsters and trucking together with General Motors, Mr. Hoffa, whose disappearance and press last year may have helped start the current investigations.

Dave Beck's corruption was largely perceived according to people who were around him when Mr. Beck was, petty. Mr. Hoffa's was institutional. He created the modern structure, complete with a decentralization that allows the individual vice presidents their baronies.

When Mr. Hoffa set up the Central States fund, he established the means for personal favors that he owed and expanding his personal relationships. "The worst thing Hoffa ever did was to start bringing a union close to Mr. Hoffa's side in the Central States, close aide to Mr. Hoffa said. "He opened a tremendous temptation."

Ford Is Developing the Underdog Role

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON

It may have been the rarified air, Pres- rives soared farther than normal on the golf rves had more zing on the tennis court. And well, after nine days of campaign strategy 200 feet above sea level in the Rockies, he f the gravitational pull of reality. The under- thought he could win.

No one really knows, yet everyone assumes, that the Pres- ident is in fact in the unusual position for an incumbent of being the challenger. He and his associates seemed even to relish the situation, to be prepared to take modest risks, such as debating Jimmy Carter, and to enjoy Americans' traditional sympathy for the long-odds, come-from-behind contender.

Scheduled to leave here today on a roundabout trip back to the White House, the President has an invigorated cam- paign staff, pledges of support from leaders of the Repub- lican right and left, and a tactical plan designed to over- come the lead of the Democratic nominee and speak to victory in November. "It's going to be close, really close, but I think he's going to make it," said Stuart Spencer, the political director and leading architect of Mr. Ford's elec- tion strategy.

Mr. Spencer and James A. Baker 3d, the new chairman of the President Ford Committee, had maps, charts and advertising outlines over which they had pored for days with their candidate. The essence of their strategy was to try to beat Mr. Carter at his own game—trust. "The issues are only vehicles," one campaign aide said. "In the end it's going to be a case of convincing voters they can trust Gerald Ford, not Jimmy Carter, in the White House."

The President and his tacticians conceded the obvious, that Mr. Carter enjoyed an enormous advantage as leader of a seemingly unified majority party and possessor of a shrunken but still large lead in the public opinion polls. Yet the Ford camp appeared genuinely convinced, as the campaign began, that it was far from over. Mr. Baker, for one, liked the status of challenger. He said the Ford campaign would take advantage, every way it could, of the underdog's asset of gathering momentum, hopefully with fortunate timing. "I'll be satisfied," he said, "if we pull ahead on Nov. 1," the day before the election.

To win from behind, Mr. Ford began trying to refashion his "image." After months of increasingly conservative, pre- nomination rhetoric, he moved left by symbolically adding progressive Republicans to his political staff and to an active support of the party's dominant right wing.

It was tricky going. John B. Connally, supposedly sour after being passed over in the selection of a Ford running mate, consented to join the President, Senator Robert J. Dole, the Vice Presidential nominee, and Nelson A. Rockefeller, the lame-duck Vice President, for seven hours of private Vall huddles and a public display of affection. To obtain the confidence of Mr. Rockefeller ("You are going to see a surge," he predicted) and the fealty of Mr. Connally ("It is critical, it is imperative that you be elected"), Mr. Ford had to pledge to campaign aggressively in their home states of New York and Texas, even though his strategists had other thoughts in mind.

The overture to progressive Republicans reflected the belief among Mr. Ford's strategists that his only hope lay in defeating Mr. Carter in the chain of industrial states stretching from New Jersey to Illinois, in California and in an assortment of less populous states in the Farm Belt, Mountain and Mid-Atlantic regions.

Ohio, once dubbed the "Mother of Presidents," epitomized the President's objective in what might be called a St. Lawrence Seaway strategy. It stands in the tier of Great Lakes states where Mr. Ford has to construct an electoral base and contains in abundance the kinds of voters, such as working class, urban Catholics and conservative truck farmers, whom the President hopes to persuade not to take a chance on a Southern Baptist peanut grower from Plains, Ga. "I'd follow Ohio like a hawk," said a leading White House strategist. "If we win Ohio, we win the election."

To win either, Mr. Ford and his advisers agreed here, would require not so much a positive appeal as a negative cam- paign to deny Mr. Carter its support.

The pattern of the Republican candidacy was established even as it was being designed last week. While Senator Dole followed up the Democratic nominee's campaign, appearances in Seattle and Des Moines, Mr. Ford remained aloof, golfing, as if not to suggest that a one-term former governor of Georgia was not in the same league as an incumbent President who had served in the nation's capital for three decades.

The suggestion that Mr. Carter is not quite up to the job was also implicit in the scheme Mr. Ford advocated for the Ford-Carter debates. He sought a confrontation right after Labor Day to shorten Mr. Carter's time to school himself on the issues; he asked for one-topic sessions on matters, such as national security policy about which an incumbent might have an inherently superior store of in- formation; and he suggested that each meeting last 90 min- utes or more, long enough to try to display a Presidential breadth knowledge.

Despite Mr. Ford's self-assured attitude, there was at least one associate inclined toward pessimism. The aide, who noted that Mr. Ford frequently took solace from the underdog victory of President Truman in 1948, said he had read every Truman speech and had concluded that the analogy did not bear close scrutiny. Unlike President Truman, who whistled his way across America, Pres- ident Ford "is a disaster as a stump speaker," the associate said. "And Truman had an advantage we won't—he was appealing to a majority party."

ky Bill led that would have helped utbacks in the New York stem has been declared al in State Supreme rther confusing the frag- s between the teachers' financially ailing Board

The issues, evolving from the requi- sites of the city's fiscal recovery plan, are layoffs, wage adjustments and effects on the school system. The voiding of the so-called Stavisky bill, which required that an additional $150 million in city funds be spent on schools, was a victory for the Beame administration, which had successfully argued that the bill would force severe reductions in other vital city services.

The Board of Education responded to the court ruling by sending out dismissal notices last week to 3,500 teachers whose jobs it had hoped to save. At the same time, the board and the United Federation of Teachers were close to agreeing on a stipulation in their two-year contract that would allow at least some wage increases, especially for teachers with long experience, as well as layoffs. The sides have been negotiating fitfully since last fall, ever since the Emergency Financial Control Board, the city's fiscal watchdog, rejected the original contractual terms as being too costly.

The announcement of layoffs provoked an angry reaction from an organization of education and civic groups. It demanded that the control board stop the school board from granting salary increases while dismissing teachers, which could force class sizes to grow and school days to shrink. This pressure, as well as comment by Albert Shanker, the union president, that the new layoffs might cause loss of accreditation of the city's high schools, prompted Stephen Berger, head of the control board, to say that the new terms would result in a reduction in services and thus would be unacceptable to the control board.

The union and the school board are back at the bargaining table.

Chasing Buckley: No Clear Leader

Six years ago, James L. Buckley won his seat in the United States Senate as a Conservative Party candidate with some 40 percent of the New York vote in a three-way race. Since then he has compiled one of the most conservative voting records in the Senate even though he represents one of the most liberal states in the Union.

That election and that record explain why Senator Buckley is the target in the Sept. 14 primary. Five Democrats are after the nomination in their party to oppose him, and a Republican is trying to deny him even the Republi- can nomination. Mr. Buckley, a Republi- can, is already assured of Conserva- tive support. The five Democrats are Representative Bella S. Abzug, the vocal West Side liberal; Ramsey Clark, the former United States Attorney General, who was a favorite target of President Nixon; Abraham Hirschfeld, a wealthy busi- nessman who is trying to make up for his lack of a political base by an expensive advertising campaign; Dan- iel P. Moynihan, the former United Nations Ambassador, who started off, at least on paper, as the Democratic front- runner, and City Council President Paul O'Dwyer, who is supported by the city Democratic organization.

Mrs. Abzug and Mr. Clark are clearly aiming for the liberal Democratic vote by emphasizing their liberal records and issues. Mr. O'Dwyer, a longtime liberal, is nevertheless trying to reach out for the support of moderate and even conservative fellow Catholic Democrats. Mr. Moynihan is also seeking that constituency by proclaiming himself a centrist. Mr. Hirschfeld em- phasizes his business and nongovern- ment background. The field is consid- ered too tightly packed to call a front- runner at the moment.

The candidates invariably touch on the same issues—jobs, the economy, Israel (to appeal to a heavily Jewish electorate) and the Federal takeover of welfare—but they are hard put to find any distinctions among them.

On the Republican side, Mr. Buckley, who has the support of the powerful state Republican organization despite his maverick record, is a clear favorite over Representative Peter Peyster, a Westchester moderate who attacks Mr. Buckley's conservative voting record. Mr. Buckley is trying to ignore Mr. Peyster, who challenged him to debate, a challenge that was also ignored.

A Plan for West Point

The Secretary of the Army has come up with a proposal for possible reinstatement of cadets found guilty in the West Point cheating scandal. But cadets and West Point officials alike don't think it will work.

Martin R. Hoffmann intervened in the scandal involving 200 accused students by offering ousted cadets the chance to reapply to the academy after one year's period of "reflection," prefer- ably on active service as enlisted men. He told a Senate Armed Services sub- committee that while there could be no assurance beforehand, "a large num- ber" of cadets would be readmitted.

This view contrasted with a state- ment by Brig. Gen. Walter L. Ulmer, the commandant of the academy, who said "We can't guarantee any of you will come back."

Committee members challenged Mr. Hoffmann, demanding to know the cri- teria for readmission. He said the de- tails hadn't been worked out.

The accused cadets and their law- yers have criticized the plan for a dif- ferent reason. They say a year's expul- sion would stigmatize them if they did return to the academy. The cadets say they already face the silent hostility of the other, nonaccused students.

But Since Attica I, There Have Been Changes

The Prisons, As Always, Are Short on Real Reform

By RINKER BUCK

The inmate strike at Attica prison is a peaceful reminder that almost five years of reform, some genuine, some cosmetic, have been all but overwhelmed by factors that state prison officials have been either unable or unwilling to change. The years since the 1971 uprising that took 43 lives have shown that the lessons of Attica not only exacted a terrible price but also are easily forgotten.

Attica and other state prisons now have such outlets as new gymnasiums and elected inmate liaison committees that meet regularly with prison superintendents to discuss policy questions. Inmate grievance committees begun last year have given prisoners the ability to formally petition the Department of Correctional Services in Albany when differences over conditions cannot be resolved internally. Strip searches have been curtailed, and censorship rules on incoming mail relaxed.

But these measures, variously described by prison admi- nistrators as "ventilation techniques" or "good security steps," do not alter the most fundamental shortcomings that have persisted since 1971. Overcrowding, and the racial conflicts inevitable when the urban inmate population, 70 percent black and Puerto Rican, is governed by upstate whites, continue to foster violent incidents. Rehabilitation programs fall far short of need and alternative institutions are not available for the thousands of prisoners who, of- ficials agree, do not belong in maximum security settings.

Conditions in other prisons in New York and New Jersey are no better than at Attica, and in some places worse. Both states are saddled with outmoded facilities and programs at a time when fiscal restraints preclude improvement in either. The rising incidence of violent crime, and a renewed trend by the courts toward longer sentences have sent in- mate populations soaring.

Overcrowding has been and continues to be the primary cause of tensions. After the Attica revolt, the state pursued a goal of reducing the population at its maximum security facilities by 25 percent. For a time this was achieved. But the recent rise in the state prison population, from 14,500 in March of 1975 to a projected 18,500 by this fall, has filled nearly every state prison to capacity. (Attica, for instance, which this week had 1,986 inmates, is only nine prisoners short of full capacity.) Thus it is no longer possible, as in past years, to keep population levels down to a more desirable 85 to 90 percent capacity by operating the less harsh work camps and medium security prisons at full capacity.

To relieve overcrowding, the state has begun converting seven vacant sites for inmate housing, such as the former Arthur Kill drug rehabilitation center on Staten Island that was taken over by the correctional services department in June. But these additions have so far only kept pace with the increasing population without reducing the pressures at existing facilities.

New Jersey's prison population has grown from 6,191 in June of 1975 to 6,540 last month. William H. Fauver, the state's Director of Corrections and Parole, says, "We are above desirable capacity in all our facilities. We have 1,100 men inside the wall at Rahway State Prison — a facility designed for 800 men." Mr. Fauver says that, of 830 in- mates at Trenton State Prison, 300 are kept three to a cell in a wing built in 1836 with cells intended for one man only. He anticipates the possibility of doubling up in cells at Leesburg State Prison if present trends continue. Prompted by serious incidents at Rahway and Trenton last February, New Jersey has transferred about 500 inmates to work camps and youth facilities. There seems to be no end in sight for New Jersey, which has 150 men backed up in county jails waiting to be transferred to prisons, according to Mr. Fauver.

Prisons: Prison administrators technically have direct control over educational and vocational training programs, but budget cuts and the overwhelming momentum of past budget and policy decisions render this authority almost meaningless. In New York, financial restraints forced a $2 million reduction in the amount spent for prison rehabilitation programs, while the budget's security and support services side, which has priority, was increased by $9 million. In New Jersey, $100,000 was cut from prison recreational programs and another $1 million was removed from the budget of the special school district that administers voca- tional and educational training in the prisons.

About 3,200 New York State inmates are employed in correctional industries that manufacture 750 products—office furniture, road signs, soap and the like. The indus- tries are a throwback to "reforms" of the 19th century, when work in shops and quarries was believed to promote self-sufficiency and responsibility in prisoners. At the only women's facility in the state, Bedford Hills in Westchester County, inmates work in a garment industry whose sole product is underwear for male prisoners. Inmates are paid according to a wage scale that, beginning at eight cents an hour, gradually moves up to 28 cents.

Some progress has been made, however, on increasing participation in programs offering inmates a choice of career opportunities after release. Before the 1971 revolt, Attica had three such programs. Now it has 17. Work and educational release was only occasional then. Now some 300 Attica inmates participate in academic programs that are run within the prison by local community colleges. Under the work release program begun in New York in 1970, inmates within a year of meeting with the parole board for release can leave traditional facilities for night- time detention centers in New York, Rochester and Buffalo. Although at least 5,000 inmates meet the standards for this program, there are only 500 places.

Idle Threat

A far greater hazard to order in the prisons is "no-work" jobs, or inmates for whom there are no programs at all. In 1961, the correctional services department built a new wing for 350 inmates at Great Meadow prison in Comstock, N.Y., but created no new programs. Superintendent Paul W. Metz estimates that another 200 inmates are assigned to nonexistent jobs or training programs. The department creates the bogus jobs so that the institution will not be denied state and Federal funds for lack of programs. Mark Corrigan, associate corrections commissioner, says there are 600 men idle at Attica. Mr. Fauver says that in New Jersey prisons, while every inmate is technically assigned a job, "this often means that 45 men are working on a kitchen shift that could easily get by with 30 men—so about 15 aren't doing much at all."

Staffing. Inadequate staffing at the racially tense insti- tutions has also been a lasting and troublesome factor. Because of the size and design of most of the prisons, usually only between 8 and 20 corrections officers can be assigned to oversee up to 1,000 inmates gathered in dining halls and recreation yards. This makes a quick, efficient response to an ordinary violent incident more difficult.

Attica superintendent Smith commented recently that on any one shift he has only 100 guards in a facility with almost 2,000 inmates, and that conditions there have not changed greatly since 1971. "If the right circumstances came along, yes, we could have another 1971-type uprising."

Mastery Teaching: Until All Are Caught Up

By EDWARD B. FISKE

In schools in the United States, at every level, pressure is high to ensure that all students receive a high quality education.

Teachers expect a handful of students to learn the mastery approach, and then the rest, it is assumed, will learn something less and receive from B to F.

For any reason, though, why students should not get A's? Why number of educators in every country and elsewhere believe in an answer is an emphatic No.

That, through an approach "mastery teaching," virtually every student can be brought to a level of learning that is only a few steps away from the mastery level.

The term "mastery teaching" was coined by Benjamin Bloom, a University of Chicago professor who in the early 1960's began to study different children learn at different rates.

The basic concept is deceptively simple. Mastery teaching assumes, by enough, that, given time and the right kind of exercises, just about every child can learn whatever a teacher offers. The trick is to organize the class so as to give each the time and teaching he needs without slowing down as a whole.

It is done by reversing the classroom method of giving students the same amount of material and then assuming they will learn it with varying degrees of thoroughness. In the amount of material to be learned is held constant, it becomes the variable.

In the mastery approach, the material is divided into units that can be covered in two weeks. At the end of each unit students are tested to see whether they have learned it. Those who have not are given special assignments as "correctives" and retested. A process that is repeated until a student has demonstrated mastery of the unit. Only when everyone has done this class move on to the next.

O'Malley uses the method in a sixth grade class at Milwaukie High School in Milwaukie, Ore. In talking with her, she first asks what they are and, after that, tests what she has learned. "If only half passes the first time, then the students who did pass go to those who didn't," she says.

course of this "corrective" makes sure that the subject is covered in different ways. In use work sheets, records or listen to a tape recording.

er with a headset," she said. "Sometimes just hearing it from a peer instead of myself is what makes the difference." Most students, she said, pass the test the second time around, and then the class moves on to, say, pronouns. "If they don't pass the second time, then I take the students aside myself and continue to work until they do," she explained.

Miss O'Malley reports that since she began using the mastery approach both fast and slow learners have ended up covering more material than before. "Some of the slow ones may have never done well before," she said. "Each time they master one building block, then they gain the confidence to master others. They develop good feelings about themselves."

Other teachers report similar results. Emmett L. Jones, who uses mastery learning in an introductory biology course at Olive-Harvey College, a community college primarily serving disadvantaged minority students in Chicago, said that 88 percent of his class ended up with A's and B's, in contrast to 35 percent in a non-mastery control group. Irene Newill, a teacher at the Nehalem Boarding School in Farmington, N. M., said that the sense of achievement mastery has fostered among previously slow learners has "cut down on behavior problems."

The most obvious objection to the mastery approach is that it shortchanges the fast learner by gearing the class to the slowest ones. Practitioners reply, though, that while at the beginning of the term the pace of the class as a whole may be slowed, this is soon overcome by the enhanced learning ability of everyone. Dr. Bloom's researchers found that, once the mastery approach is well established, most students tend to pass a test the first time.

Overall efficiency is also achieved because, as James Block, a professor at the University of California at Santa Barbara, noted, "You don't waste a lot of time at the end of the term teaching what should have been learned earlier." In practice, however, many teachers defuse the fast-learner issue by dividing classes into fast and slow tracks and then employing the mastery approach within each group—a practice abhorred by purists such as Dr. Bloom.

Despite the enthusiasm of teachers who have used it successfully, there has been virtually no independent research on mastery methods at the elementary and secondary level. Thomas G. Sticht, associate director of the National Institute of Education, said last week that there is evidence that this approach has helped persons who might otherwise be expected to fail to complete certain courses. "While it is not an unreasonable expectation," he said, "there is no conclusive evidence that it increases the rate of learning." Studies of the mastery approach at the college level have found it to be generally effective, but subject to the drawback of any kind of independent study: procrastination on the part of the student.

Dr. Bloom estimates that several million students are now being taught under the mastery techniques in this country and abroad. In all such situations, some fundamental educational assumptions are being challenged.

Foremost among these is the belief that some students are simply incapable of learning what the teacher is teaching. Mastery teaching firmly asserts that, with the exception of a small minority of students with physiologically-based learning problems, all children are capable of academic success as traditionally defined.

The assumption that everyone can experience academic success strikes at the credentialing function of educational institutions. If everyone does well, how will employers and graduate schools sort people out? It also undermines the competitiveness that lies at the heart of American education. Learning becomes a social experience, which, in the process teaches social skills, rather than another battleground in which individuals struggle against each other for rewards that lie outside the learning process itself.

As a movement, mastery education is built on other recent educational trends, including the generally accepted but erratically implemented ideal of individualized instruction. And it comes at a time when people are becoming aware of the limitations of another ideal: universal education.

In a recent article in The College Board Review, K. Patricia Cross, a research psychologist, notes that since the 1950's educators have concentrated on expanding "access" to higher education for minority and other students who were previously excluded. While they have succeeded in getting students into school, though, they have not always known what to do with them.

Miss Cross argues that mastery education may be the key to solving this problem. "American higher education has worked hard for the past quarter of a century to achieve education for all," she observes. "It looks very much as though we shall spend the remaining 24 years of this century working to achieve education for each."

Edward B. Fiske is education editor of The New York Times.

The Point Man

George Blanda of the Oakland Raiders is apparently finished after more than a quarter-century in the National Football League. Blanda, a place-kicking quarterback who began with the Chicago Bears, was told by the Raiders last week that he had been put on waivers. None of the league's other teams picked him up. "They'd be crazy if they do," he said. "Who wants a 48-year-old place-kicker with a $90,000 contract?" Blanda holds league records for the most seasons played (26), most games played (342) and most points scored (2,002). He will be replaced by a rookie, Fred Steinfurt, born two years after Blanda started playing pro ball.

A Soledad Brother

Fleets Drungo, one of three defendants recently acquitted in the "San Quentin Six" murder-conspiracy trial, has been released from the California state prison. Mr. Drungo had been accused of participating in an escape attempt from Soledad prison in August 1971, during which George Jackson, the black revolutionary and author was killed, along with three guards and two inmate trustees. The killings occurred just two days before Mr. Jackson, Mr. Drungo and another inmate, John Chuchette, were to go on trial for the 1970 murder of a prison guard at Soledad. In April 1972, Mr. Drungo and Mr. Chuchette were acquitted of the charges. Mr. Drungo has been in prison for nearly 10 years, serving a six-month to 15-year sentence for second-degree burglary.

New Federal Judge

Vincent L. Broderick, the police commissioner of New York City from 1965 to 1966, has been nominated for the Federal bench by President Ford. If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Broderick, a Democrat, would succeed Judge Harold R. Tyler Jr., who retired last year from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. The nomination of Mr. Broderick had been recommended by Senators Jacob K. Javits, a Republican, and James L. Buckley, a Conservative-Republican. A White House spokesman said last week that the selection of a Democrat presumably reflected the President's judgment that Mr. Broderick "was the best person for the appointment."

If Court Ruling Stands, Regents Must Step In Disastrous Year Ahead for City Schools

Last week the New York State Supreme Court, the lowest court in the state, overturned the Stavisky-Goodman Law as unconstitutional. The law was designed to protect New York City public schools from disproportionate budget reductions during the fiscal crisis by mandating that the schools receive the same proportion of the city budget—not the same amount of money—as they had received in the previous three years.

The Stavisky-Goodman Law had a long and stormy history. It was debated in the press and in the legislature for most of the long legislative session. It was passed by both houses, but vetoed by the Governor. Then, for the first time in 104 years, the veto was overridden.

This week's decision is a strange one. Justice Abraham Gellinoff argues that the law violates the home rule provision of the State Constitution, that the "Stavisky-Goodman Law dictates the expenditure priorities and programs for the city, and thereby directly interferes with its property, affairs and government." But if this reasoning prevails, did the state have the right to enact the Financial Emergency Act for the City of New York? Did it have the right to create the Emergency Financial Control Board to monitor the city budget?

The judge's opinion seems to justify the Financial Emergency Act on the special ground that the city's fiscal problem "is a disaster and creates a state of emergency. To end this disaster, to bring the emergency under control and to respond to the overriding state concern described above," Judge Gellinoff wrote, "the state must undertake an extraordinary exercise of its police and emergency powers under the State Constitution, and exercise control and supervision over the financial affairs of the city of New York, but in a manner intended to preserve the ability of city officials to determine program and expenditure priorities within available financial resources."

State Mandates Many Other City Expenses

If the Financial Emergency Act can be justified on the basis of the need to use "police" and "emergency" powers, the same cannot be said of other laws which compel the city to spend and which violate its home rule.

There are many such laws. The most expensive is the law in which New York State mandates who shall receive welfare payments, as well as the level of those payments, and requires that local communities pay a substantial share of the cost. If it is unconstitutional for the state to order New York City to spend another $100 to $150 million on its schools, why is it constitutional for the state to mandate the expenditure of $1 billion on welfare?

The State Supreme Court decision is being appealed. We may hope the higher courts will find that the legislature clearly knew what it was doing when it passed the law and that if the state can mandate welfare and other expenditures, it can also mandate educational ones. As a matter of fact, the legislature has a constitutional obligation to do so, since the State Constitution says that the legislature has the duty to "provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated."

No Resemblance to Education in Rest of State

But with the overturn of the Stavisky-Goodman Law the children of New York City will not be receiving an education. Schools will reopen with 6,000 fewer teachers than last year—2,500 leaving the system through attrition and 3,500 new layoffs—and 18,000 fewer than at the end of school in June 1975. Class size will soar, course offerings will disappear. There will be no resemblance between what is called education in New York City and what is provided for all other children in the state.

While the courts are considering the appeals, it is time for the New York State Board of Regents to act. Throughout the country, high schools are accredited by regional organizations, but in New York State that is the responsibility of the Board of Regents. An investigation of our high schools should lead the Regents to warn colleges and universities that students graduating from New York City schools have not had an "education" in the usual sense of the word. But the Regents should not limit their investigation to the high schools alone. With the new cuts in the school staff, New York schools will have a smaller staff than in the early 1960s—even with more students and students with different, and more severe, problems and handicaps. With these cutbacks we undo the gains of federal aid, and we wipe out a quarter of a century of educational progress. What is happening to education represents no less a disaster than the fiscal crisis itself. It calls for action.

Congress Under Pressure

As the 94th Congress enters what is likely to be its final month, it is under pressure from an accumulated backlog of work, inescapable legislative deadlines, and the atmosphere of a closely fought national political campaign. From full employment bills to health insurance, from education appropriations to day care, and from abortion to gun control—unresolved issues demand decisions. But the 94th has been stalemated by the power struggle between a Republican President and a Democratic-controlled House and Senate. Two years of veto battles have drained the zest, and left both majority and minority parties in Capitol Hill passively awaiting the outcome of the November election.

Expectations of Congress differ depending upon one's necessities and expectations. For the more than seven million unemployed and their families, bills to stimulate the national economy are at the head of any list. The most ambitious is the full employment bill sponsored by Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, Minnesota Democrat, and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins, California Democrat. The Humphrey-Hawkins bill is strongly backed by organized labor, but its provisions for national economic planning and aggressive Government spending to reduce adult unemployment to three percent by 1980 are too controversial for enactment in this pre-election atmosphere. There is no consensus on the bill among Democrats, much less between a liberal Congress and a conservative President.

If Humphrey-Hawkins is dead for this year, two other, more conventional, measures show greater promise of staying alive. Both houses have passed different versions of a bill to extend the existing program for public service jobs in recession-hit communities. To prevent this program from expiring in early October, both houses must reach agreement on the size and duration of the extension.

Veto Battle Ahead

Early agreement can also be expected from a conference committee on the exact size of an approximately $3.5 billion appropriation to finance a public works program by state and local governments. President Ford vetoed the authorization for this program but Congress passed it over his veto. Mr. Ford is likely to reject this bill when it reaches him, but Congressional Democrats are confident that they will again override.

A veto is also probable against the $56 billion appropriation bill for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare because added sums, mostly in education, are $4 billion above the President's request. But with the economy still underperforming, the public service jobs program and the public works program are both clearly necessary. Since many local communities are still forced to cut budgets, increased Federal aid for schools is likewise needed.

From a middle-class perspective, the complex tax bill is probably the item of highest concern. A conference committee last week began the onerous task of reconciling the modest reform measure approved by the House and the revenue-losing giveaway finally approved by the Senate. Fortunately, the most desirable outcome also seems the most probable. After weeks of haggling, the committee is likely to settle for a simple extension of the existing personal and business tax reductions, leaving substantial revision of the Internal Revenue Code until next year.

Too Controversial?

Under the gun of the election, Congress seems sure to postpone such controversial issues as national health insurance, gun control, postcard voter registration, divestiture by oil conglomerates, and S-1, the revision of the Federal criminal code. Any one of these measures is sufficiently complex to provoke a possible Senate filibuster that would kill most of the available time between now and the expected Oct. 1 adjournment.

Some existing programs that require hard decisions cannot, however, be postponed. Revenue sharing, foreign aid, and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration all require—and deserve—renewal this year. Similarly, the automobile industry cannot do its forward planning for future models unless Congress makes up its mind now about the timetable for emission controls under the Clean Air Act of 1970. The Senate has passed a sound bill on this subject; the House, which is scheduled to take up the problem this week, would do well to accept the Senate's bill and send it to Mr. Ford.

A Senate-House conference committee is trying to reconcile a disagreement on procurement of the costly B-1 bomber. Since this may well become a major issue in the national campaign between President Ford and Governor Carter, the House can best resolve the dispute by going along with the Senate's wise decision to bar any production of the bomber until next February. By then, the people will have made their wishes known.

Prophecy . . .

The following are excerpts from Alan Paton's novel about South Africa, "Cry, the Beloved Country," written in 1948:

And some cry for the cutting up of South Africa without delay into separate areas, where white can live without black, and black without white . . .

Yes, there are a hundred, and a thousand voices crying. But what does one do, when one cries this thing, and one cries another? Who knows how we shall fashion a land of peace where black outnumbers white so greatly? . . .

Who knows how we shall fashion such a land? For we fear not only the loss of our possessions, but the loss of our superiority and the loss of our whiteness. . . . Is it not better to hold what we have, and to pay the price of it with fear? And others say, can such fear be endured? . . .

We do not know, we do not know. We shall live from day to day, and put more locks on the doors, and get a fine fierce dog . . . and the beauty of the trees by night, and the raptures of lovers under the stars, these things we shall forego . . . And our lives will shrink, but they shall be the lives of superior beings; and we shall live with fear, but at least it will not be a fear of the unknown. And the conscience shall be thrust down; the light of life shall not be extinguished, but be put under a bushel, to be preserved for a generation that will live by it again, in some day not yet come; and how it will come, and when it will come, we shall not think about at all . . .

Cry, the beloved country, for the unborn child that is the inheritor of our fear . . .

Copyright 1948 by Alan Paton

. . . Grim Fulfillment?

The most discouraging aspect of the violence in South Africa is the refusal of the country's white rulers to learn basic lessons. These lessons cannot be obscured by the restocking of tribal animosities—the tragic backlash of Zulu workers in Soweto against young militants of other ethnic groups—which some eyewitnesses say was encouraged by South African police.

One of the lessons is that the three-day strike to keep 250,000 Soweto blacks from their jobs in Johannesburg was a remarkably successful first effort. Despite police harassment and the backlash, the strike leaders made their point: The black workers in the townships can cripple South Africa's economy whenever they decide collectively to withhold their labor.

The white minority Government cannot ignore that lesson. Yet, on the eve of the strike, the Minister for Bantu Affairs reiterated the old apartheid maxim that the blacks are present in "white" South Africa "to sell their labor and for nothing else." And listeners say they heard the Justice Minister say in a speech—though he later denied it—that the black man "knows his place and if not I will tell him his place."

A second major lesson the Government ought by now to have learned is that a few concessions, such as the decision that urban blacks in the townships may now own their homes, will not restore tranquility for long. Required is a change of direction—a decision by the white rulers to scrap their bogus "separate development" blueprint and begin the dismantling of apartheid.

Leaders of seven of the nine black "homelands"—the chief ministers whom the white Government is trying to push toward "independence"—laid out eloquently last week what is required for peace in "our beloved country, the land of our births": End laws based on color, accept the blacks as permanent "everywhere in this country," free imprisoned black leaders or try them in a court of law, grant the black majority "full human rights."

The seven black leaders declared they had no intention of opting for "so-called independence" under apartheid. Unwilling "to abdicate our birthright as South Africans" or to forfeit "our share of the economy and the wealth, which we have jointly built," they demanded "a common South Africanism and a common purpose for all South Africa."

It was not the first time the leaders had pressed such demands but as yet there has been no indication of a more positive response from Pretoria than on previous appeals. But what ought to concern the whites most of all is that the men who made those demands are under savage attack from more militant blacks as stooges of the white Government—another of the lessons out of the Soweto cauldron, another indication of how rapidly the chances for a peaceful evolution in South Africa are slipping away.

Moving Too Fast

Senator Edward M. Kennedy is working hard to rush the new national security wiretap legislation through the Senate. The measure, designed to impose order and restraint on wiretapping activities in areas where there have been no legislative restrictions in the past, was originally developed by a bipartisan group of Senators on the Judiciary Committee and by the Attorney General. After the bill had been considered by both the Judiciary Committee and the new Select Committee on Intelligence, Senator Kennedy, with apparent impatience, attempted to schedule it on a highly expedited basis with severely limited debate on Monday.

A long list of abuses has been rationalized by incantation of "national security." The first legislative effort to curb such practices is bound to be sensitive and fraught with uncertainty. For example, the proposed measure is marred by at least one major flaw: It authorizes wiretapping in instances which lack proof of crime or a showing of probable cause that a crime has been or is about to be committed. This runs counter to the explicit recommendation of the Church committee that such a showing be the basis for authorizing wiretaps. Senator Walter Mondale, chairman of the Church committee's task force on domestic intelligence, testified before the intelligence committee for two hours in opposition to this measure.

The one lesson that should have impressed the Congress after the long months of intelligence investigations and disclosures is that American citizens suffered from abuses precisely because Congress failed to do its job diligently. Rushing to a decision on so sensitive a bill without full debate and consideration would seem to suggest more of the same lack of diligence.

Letters to the Editor

Changing West Point's Honor System

To the Editor:

On the eve of Army Secretary Martin Hoffmann's announcement of recommended changes to West Point's honor system, I am still pinching myself in hopes that this unreal situation is actually a dream. The Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Army are going to change a system whose cornerstone is honesty and whose purpose is to produce Army officers who can stand up and face pressure and tell the truth.

My father taught me early in life that a man's honesty was his most sacred possession. This concept was reinforced during four years at West Point and has guided me during seven years in the Army. Now my leaders are trying to weaken this most basic and crucial foundation of human character.

I can agree that a punishment less than expulsion might be considered for a cadet who, without thinking, lied about polishing his shoes and the next day stepped forward and admitted his error. But to introduce a new honor system and concurrently pardon cadets who calculatedly participated in a carefully thought out cheating ring is unthinkable. Pardon these "cadets" [sic] because "West Point's honor system and academic pressures are partly to blame . . ."? I can't understand this reasoning. How will these men react to the greater pressures of the battlefield?

Nor can I understand other reasons which have been set forth by Army lawyers defending accused cadets and by some Congressmen, evidently sincere in their beliefs, but not very sound in their logic. That the honor system is anachronistic? I just can't agree that honesty is outdated. That cadets are denied their individual rights when accused of violating the honor system? I don't think it's asking too much of any young man who accepts an entirely free four-year college education that he should abide by the rules of the present honor system at West Point.

Each Congressman so strongly opposed to the honor system at West Point—one that has served well during the training of combat leaders for several wars—should face his constituency at home and ask their views on today's applicability of honor. The honor that was so sadly lacking among many of our nation's recent leaders is still needed by today's Army officers. Are we to sit by and allow certain Congressmen quietly to erode the honor system at West Point, an institution that has faithfully done its duty for 174 years? Let these elected leaders stand up and tell their constituents that they helped weaken the West Point honor system—because they certainly don't propose to strengthen it. [Editorial Aug. 25.]

Desert Environment

To the Editor:

As a former resident of Phoenix, Arizona, I read with interest the article of Aug. 22 relating to possible water shortages in the Southwest and the proposed solutions. In the midst of a population shift to Arizona cities and the attendant brisk sales of real estate and new construction, it seems that few are truly appreciating the realities of the desert environment.

We ask to grow green grass there, which demands much water, meanwhile tearing away the uniquely suitable (and beautiful) Sonoran desert vegetation to do so. To support our thirsty alien plants, laws being "part of the quality of life," Mr. Pugh and the Central Arizona Project wish to pump salty water 300 miles uphill from an already flagging Colorado River, to a reservoir to be located on the site of the Fort McDowell Indian Reservation, meaning "relocation" of the mostly elderly Indian population. The large surface area of the lake-reservoir will lose countless gallons of water daily to the hot dry desert air in the process of getting some of it to the grass roots.

What is needed by Northerners seeking the desert sun, as well as by many of the natives, is the awareness that the Sonoran desert of Arizona is not Wisconsin, Ohio, or New York State, where grasses grow more naturally. The choice to enjoy year-round sunshine should also include exchanging the lawn for sage, saguaro, ocotillo, and prickly pear.

G.O.P. and Big Government

To the Editor:

I find the title "Republicans Are Together—in Fear of Big Government" (Week in Review Aug. 15) more than a little ironic when it is the Republicans who most vigorously (though by no means exclusively) champion the gigantic military establishment which dominates Government resources.

With a budget of over $100,000,000,000, with contracts with major industries throughout the country, with manpower (and some womanpower) in the millions, the Pentagon's part in Big Government is hardly to be ignored. When the Republican Party overcomes its blindness to this cancerous elephantine appendage (a tail which surely can be said to wag the dog), then I will begin to listen with some credulity to their wallings about Big Government.

Denying Racial Heritage

To the Editor:

To my surprise I found the other day the Association for Indians in America Inc., a New York based non-profit organization claiming to represent immigrants from India, loudly protesting against the categorization of Indians as Caucasians by the Federal Intergovernmental Commission. The principal thrust of the protest was that if classified as Caucasians or whites, Indians would be ineligible for consideration in affirmative action programs which assist members of other minority groups like Asian Americans, blacks, Hispanics, American Indians, etc. In its drive to seek minority status for Asian Indians, the organization is ready to deny the racial heritage of the people it is supposed to represent, and to my mind, it is the height of political opportunism.

Indians residing in this great country should, indeed, be happy that a long overdue racial classification has finally been accorded to them by an agency of the Federal Government, thereby drawing them into the mainstream of American life. While Indians continue to be racially discriminated against in many other parts of the world, it must be considered no small honor to have been given this rightful recognition of their national distinction in a country other than that of their birth and ancestry. It is a pity that the trends of the contemporary liberal-bourgeois society should have blinded the officials of the Association for Indians in America to the extent of this self-abnegation in the interest of economic considerations.

I happen to be an Indian resident of the United States for almost two decades, and this recognition of my racial heritage of which I am extremely proud has come to me as a source of great satisfaction. It is time Indians abroad, especially in the United States, merged with the mainstream on grounds of racial affinity and not walk with the motley crowd of the minorities motivated by economic and material interests. The diversified cultural heritage that Indians possess will always set them apart as a distinctive ethnic group from their other Caucasian brothers.

A separate racial category for Indians in addition to the already existing nine categories established by the Census of the United States, as demanded by the Indian association, is not necessary. Let us hope that this official recognition of their racial status, though somewhat belated, will contribute substantially toward enhancing the prestige and power of large segments of the Indian population that have chosen to reside abroad—not only in the United States, but in other parts of the world as well.

The Schorr Follies

By Charles W. Whalen Jr.

WASHINGTON—Arthur Miller's talents are not needed to complete "The View from the D.C. Jail." The first two acts of the Daniel Schorr drama already have been produced. The last act could be penned by any sophomore.

Act I occurred on Feb. 19. Finding that the "alleged actions of the said Daniel Schorr may be in contempt of . . . this House," the House of Representatives directed the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to "inquire into the circumstances surrounding the publication of the text and any part of the report of the Select Committee on Intelligence."

Act II, Scene 1, was staged on March 3 when the House authorized Chairman John Flynt's committee to subpoena witnesses to carry out its investigation. In Scene 2, presented on March 29, the House granted the committee $150,000 to hire investigative staff.

The script of the last act is predictable. Congressman Flynt announced last Wednesday that C.B.S. reporter Schorr will be subpoenaed to testify before the Flynt committee. Citing the journalists' code of ethics which forbids disclosure of sources, Schorr will refuse to name his informant. The committee's subsequent contempt of Congress citation will be approved by the House. The Supreme Court, reaffirming its 1972 Caldwell decision, will reject Mr. Schorr's claim of First Amendment protection. In the final scene, Mr. Schorr will be escorted to the District of Columbia jail, remaining until Congress adjourns in October.

Is the foregoing scenario likely? Mr. Schorr's transmittal of the "leaked" report to the Village Voice presents the House with a rare opportunity to wreak vengeance against what many members view as their mortal enemy—the press. Cooler heads, of course, might help avert a confrontation with Mr. Schorr. Yet when Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill moved to sidetrack the inquiry resolution to the Rules Committee, he was overruled by a 172-219 margin. Thus, House members also might ignore Minority Leader John Rhodes' suggestion that if Mr. Schorr refuses to disclose his sources, "so be it; that is his prerogative as a newsmen."

In deciding whether to make a Schorr-Congressional showdown a reality, the Flynt committee should consider the following facts.

First, in almost every instance, journalists, when subpoenaed, refuse to reveal their sources. One of the earliest press-government conflicts involved James Simonton, a New York Times reporter. More than a century ago, he wrote that several Congressmen were accepting bribes. When asked by a House select committee to name his informants, Simonton responded: "I cannot without a violation of confidence, than which I would rather suffer anything." On Jan. 21, 1857, the House voted Simonton in contempt and placed him in custody. Nineteen days later, however, convinced that Simonton would never divulge his sources, the House approved his discharge.

Second, investigative authorities, notwithstanding journalists' uncommunicativeness, usually have unraveled the mysteries assigned them. For example, without learning James Simonton's source of information, the select committee determined that his charges were true and three Congressmen subsequently resigned.

Third, the Schorr case brings into focus the question of government classification. Representative Otis Pike (New York Democrat), Chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, states that the contents of his report, while embarrassing, are not inimical to our nation's security. There are 14,738 individuals empowered to classify material handled by the executive branch. Few papers escape the classifier's stamp.

The Flynt committee's principal function is to identify the person who transmitted Congressionally proscribed material to unauthorized individuals. However, the committee can make a truly significant contribution to the public's "right to know" by analyzing classification procedures and recommending a more realistic system—one designed to protect security, not misdeeds or mistakes.

In pursuing these dual objectives, the committee has two choices. It can follow the "D.C. Jail" script which is sure-fire box office. Or it can adopt a modified third act which extends Mr. Schorr the right to protect his source of information. In either case, the findings ultimately would be the same. However, the latter version would spare the country the spectacle of a public trial and incarceration.

Making Hash, Not Hay

By Tom Wicker

Trying to make political hay in the farm belt, first Gerald Ford, then Jimmy Carter, then Bob Dole made hash of the subject of embargoes on American farm exports. And none of them touched on the real issue—the need for the development of adequate grain reserves in this country.

Mr. Carter was forced in Iowa to retreat from the untenable position that if elected would "stop embargoes once and for all." That gave Mr. Dole a nice chance to criticize the Democratic nominee for changing positions. But then Mr. Dole had to concede that Mr. Ford, too, had pledged "no embargoes" in his Kansas City acceptance speech.

Mr. Dole tried to retrieve Mr. Ford's position by saying that anyone who said "no more embargoes" should also say "except in national emergency" and that in Mr. Ford's speech, "I think that is implied." Mr. Carter said that he had meant to make about the same exception—no embargoes except in extreme circumstances that he did not expect to see.

Obviously, however, both Mr. Ford and Mr. Carter were fishing for the farm vote rather than stating rational policy when they originally pledged "no more embargoes." As a farmer like Mr. Carter ought to know, crop failures at home or abroad, or both, might force any President to shut off grain exports in order to feed the American people and hold domestic food prices at reasonable levels.

The likeliest way to avoid such a necessity would be to develop new American grain reserves. Until 1972, such reserves enabled the United States to export large quantities of grain, supply the domestic market and still maintain stable consumer prices. Until grain reserves are on hand again, to promise "no embargoes" is only slightly more honest than pledging "no more bad weather."

American grain reserves began to vanish not long after Richard Nixon, with the aid of Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz, poured almost $3 billion into farm areas in advance of the 1972 election. They did this by paying farmers to withhold 60 million acres of grain land from production in 1972; that was the most land taken out of production for many years, and the deed was done for political purposes despite some obvious signals of an approaching world shortage.

Then, in the summer of 1972, the Soviet Union made up for its own crop failure by buying 19 million tons of American grain. When the Nixon Administration nevertheless held 20 million acres out of production again in 1973, and when other major foreign buyers like China came into the American market, the grain reserves were finished.

That meant higher domestic food prices, a cost squeeze on livestock producers, a grain market at the mercy of sudden shifts in demand, without the cushion against price fluctuations once provided by a huge reserve. In 1973, shortages forced Mr. Nixon to impose an embargo on exports of soybeans and 40 other commodities. In 1975, Gerald Ford persuaded the grain companies to accept a moratorium—with the effect of an embargo—on exports. The Ford Administration also was forced to negotiate an agreement of dubious enforceability with the Soviet Union, providing that they would buy not more than 17 million tons from the 1975 American grain crop, and at least 6 million but not more than 8 million tons in each of the five following crop years.

Meanwhile, 111 million acres of American land that could be planted to grain are not in use. Production from some of that land, plus an incentive price, could yield enough grain to supply world and domestic markets while developing a new American grain reserve.

A National Farmers' Union plan, for example, would re-establish something like the support-price system of the 1940's and 1950's, with farmers guaranteed either a market price at or above parity or a government loan on their crops at, say, 90 percent of parity—which would be well above the market price of grain today. But crop loans at even 75 percent of parity probably would provide sufficient incentive. (Parity is a complex calculation of the price at which farmers supposedly maintain their 1952 purchasing power for their farming needs.)

The Nixon-Ford Administrations have kept support levels at less than half of parity, which offers farmers little help. The Democratic platform promises support levels high enough to cover the costs of production; so did Jimmy Carter in Iowa the other day.

"Reserve" is currently a bad word to farmers, who associate it with the grain program of the 1960's that depressed prices—which is no doubt why neither Mr. Carter nor Mr. Ford wants to talk about building up new grain reserves. In the long run, however, a responsible reserve program would cushion the grain market against crop failures and price fluctuations, and remove the necessity for political talk about "no more embargoes."

Jingo: Not as It Sounds

By C. L. Sulzberger

Proclaimed experts on United States politics pretend to detect weakness in support for Jimmy Carter's Presidential candidacy among American Jewish and Catholic voters. With no personal pretension to such expertise myself I cannot judge the validity of such estimates.

Yet it is noteworthy that, in a recent talk with me, Georgia's erstwhile governor listed first in his priority of United States "major commitments" abroad that "to aid Israel." I have no way of deducing if this was more than conversational accident. Likewise, although he is a Baptist, when I asked if he favored an exchange of ambassadors between Washington and Vatican City, he replied: "Personally I have no objection to such a move."

My own impression is that the political issue of a candidate's religion was pretty well eliminated during John F. Kennedy's successful campaign in 1960 and that Mr. Carter, recognizing the total separation of church and state in the United States, was not courting sectarian votes but simply replying to specific questions addressed to him—and as they arose.

Other answers less clear in their implications emerged rather fuzzily. Thus, on the subject of "Euro-Communism," meaning Western Communism as practiced, for example, in Italy, I had the impression that Mr. Carter and his advisers haven't apparently reached a definite conclusion. Mr. Carter told me:

"If Communist leaders do obtain major roles in allied governments, it need not necessarily be a catastrophe from our viewpoint, although it would undoubtedly be a source of major concern. Nevertheless, the United States shouldn't withdraw its support from such a country in such an event; that would only impel it toward the Soviet Union."

It is my feeling that the aims of United States foreign policy are not disputed with nearly so much vigor by the Democratic and Republican candidates—despite asseverations of their party platforms—as is its methodology. In this respect the single word "Kissinger" sums up all kinds of debatable connotations. And President Ford weakened his own position by banning use of the word "détente" to describe his goals while simultaneously seeking detentes through Mr. Kissinger. The Secretary of State's basic weakness is one that any diplomatic right arm of the United States chief executive must now have: He cannot be in two places at once. When he personally negotiates Middle East cease-fires or backdoor approaches to Moscow via Peking he cannot but diminish his personal attentions to such other areas as Africa, Cyprus—or relationships with an often-critical United States Congress.

The only answer is to face up—as neither candidate does—to the necessity of accepting an idea once pondered by Harry Truman: naming two cabinet ministers to deal with the problem; a stay-at-home secretary of state and a roving negotiator, the secretary for foreign affairs.

An adverse argument is often advanced: No other country would send its top man to negotiations if the U.S. diplomatic number one was absent. Well, what about the days when Mr. Kissinger himself, then Richard Nixon's national security adviser, was far preferred as an interlocutor to Secretary of State William Rogers?

A crucial point on which neither Mr. Carter nor Mr. Ford is blatantly clear is American military strength. They both mutter about approximate "sufficiency" in the balance-of-terror with the Soviet Union. Mr. Carter says he wants to negotiate more toughly with Moscow and implies he would abandon the concept of "limited" nuclear warfare strategy—which inescapably leads toward the ultimate "massive retaliation" logic of the Eisenhower years.

But then the United States had a convincing atomic superiority, which is far from being true today. So, even as a theory, the idea makes little sense. Nevertheless, apart from nuclearis, Mr. Carter shows common-sense recognition of the need to review United States overseas commitments and bases, and acknowledges the need possibly some day to resume a modified military draft system.

One might add, in reviewing the policy intentions of the two candidates, that we will certainly be more respected in the third world if we are stronger rather than merely generous. Being successively outpaced by India, Vietnam, Cambodia, Angola and even North Korea does not build prestige.

Nor, one might add, are such embarrassments compensated for by events like the costly rescue of the little steamer Mayaguez off a Cambodian spit or chopping down a poplar tree in Korea's neutral zone. It is counter-productive to announce dire threats—and then do nothing. I do not recommend that we behave like jingoes but if we cease to sound like jingoes we might gain respect.

Keeping the Cities Down to Size

By LAWRENCE G. SAGER

The town of Ramapo, N.Y., and the city of Petaluma, Calif., are destined to be remembered as early cases in what is likely to be a protracted legal war over the power of municipalities to regulate their growth. The outcome of the controversy may significantly influence patterns of residential development throughout the United States.

Municipal growth control is part of the broad issue of land use and thus is related philosophically to the kind of law passed in California last week. The California law gives a state commission jurisdiction over future development along the state's entire coastline.

Ramapo and Petaluma were among the first of the growing list of communities in this country to adopt growth-control ordinances. The limited-growth movement comes at a time when civil rights and civil liberties groups are actively challenging even traditional zoning practices as unlawfully exclusionary.

The United States Supreme Court has begun to show some interest in the controversies. It recently upheld against constitutional challenges a charter provision of the city of Eastlake, Ohio, which requires that any changes in the zoning status of land within the city be approved first by the City Council and then by 55 percent of the voters in a citywide referendum.

The Ramapo ordinance incorporates a complicated formula for timing residential development. Under it, a developer can secure permission to build only when and where there are adequate sewage and drainage facilities, schools, roads, firehouses and recreational facilities. The delay in construction on any given site could be as long as 18 years. The "Petaluma Plan" is less refined; it simply limits all residential construction to 500 houses a year.

Each of these growth-control schemes has survived a court challenge, but neither judicial outcome can be treated as decisive. The New York Court of Appeals held that in principle, growth control ordinances like Ramapo's were within the legal authority of municipalities, but warned that "we will not countenance . . . under any guise . . . community efforts at immunization or exclusion."

The Federal Court of Appeals which heard the challenge to the Petaluma Plan was plainly sympathetic to the ordinance, but did not actually rule on the matter. A builders association had challenged the plan as violating the right to travel—on the ground that it kept people from moving into the community—but the court said the association did not have standing to sue because it was trying to raise constitutional claims for others, not itself.

More Towns Are Taking Sides

There is no tabulation of communities that have adopted growth control ordinances, but the list is believed to include several dozen. As more communities join the movement, the controversy is likely to become widespread.

The two sides have in common a recognition that land-use controls have an immediate and drastic impact on the quality of life, and that competing and controverted human values ride on the outcome of land-use decisions. Both thus reject the orthodox vision of zoning as a detached and scientific process of simply segregating incompatible uses of land. It is in the resolution of the conflicts of values that the sides divide.

The point of departure for the opponents of exclusionary zoning is that some suburban communities, motivated by their own self-interest, have enacted zoning ordinances covering large regions, with restrictions that preclude the construction of housing for anyone of less than very substantial economic means. These restrictions, until recently, have mainly been the prohibition of apartments, and requirements of large minimum lot and house sizes. The consequences of such zoning include:

- A drastic shortage of decent housing for large segments of the society.
 - Perpetration and exacerbation of residential segregation by race, with poor minorities confined in the deteriorating inner city, while jobs, housing starts, and integrated quality educational opportunities are mainly in the suburbs.
 - Dramatic intergovernmental inequalities, with the inner cities saddled with a mounting need for costly municipal services occasioned by the population stranded there, while their bases are being eroded by the relocation of businesses in the very suburbs that refuse to accommodate their share of the region's housing needs.
- Increasingly, suburban communities are being made to answer claims in state and Federal courts that their zoning decisions are unconstitutional or otherwise unlawful because of their exclusionary nature. Although these claims have certainly not been uniformly successful, they have enjoyed enough success to undermine the comfortable legal base that once secured local zoning.

The provenance of the limited-growth movement is also respectable. It has become evident that bigger is not necessarily better. And the idea that communities should moderate growth while the roads, sewers, schools and parks necessary to service an expanded population are generated has an obvious appeal.

The next step is also reinforced by the view derived from chaotic suburban growth: that communities ought to be able to draw some final limits on their size and density of population. Out of a concern for the environment, for public health and for a favored residential life-style there thus emerge claims that growth must be orderly, and limited to an expansion of facilities and that growth must have its final limits in any given community. This is the basis of the new limited or limited growth controls.

Head-on legal collisions between these forces seem inevitable. The Ramapo and Petaluma cases were merely early skirmishes. What follows are some possibilities for the future reconciliation of the clash in trends:

- The new species of growth controls may not be outlawed as such. Courts may affirm the right of zoning to address directly the questions of growth that been tacitly at stake in decisions implementing zoning mechanisms.

• Courts and legislatures are likely, however, and enforce requirements that local community land-use controls to accommodate their fair housing needs of the citizens of the regions or are parts.

• Some measure of local autonomy over the land use is likely to be diminished in favor of statewide planning. There may well be a need to increase control of growth. But the great influence over human lives that will thereby by government will probably have to be lodged at a level of government whose constituency interests of a single community.

"Your chances of surviving this experience are better than your chances of paying for it."

"America's health costs are the nation's true costs of 'living' And these costs have more than doubled in eight years. As a result, health care now costs every man, woman and child $550 a year. You pay for health three ways: In insurance, either directly or through your employer. In medical bills not covered by insurance. And in taxes. For all the money the insurance companies take in, they don't come close to covering Americans adequately. Only one-third of the nation's health bill is covered by insurance, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield. The rest comes out of your pocket. Still more comes out of your taxes. Because nearly 40 million Americans cannot afford any hospitalization insurance at all. These unfortunate people are treated at public hospitals. At public expense. But public funds are running out. Even as cities and states cut medical payments, Medicaid costs are rising so fast, government can't keep up. And rising health care costs have also driven up the most unfair tax of all—the Social Security tax. There is a method to end this madness: national health insurance. Several such plans are before Congress. Each one will cut health care costs, by giving the consumer a voice in getting decent medical care at a decent price. National health insurance works. Indeed, it works in virtually every free society in the world. We must have the courage to abandon our present irrational, expensive system. And insure every American the right to a long and healthy life."

An Open Letter in the Course of Inhuman Events

Fellow Americans:

You may already know something of the long-concealed martyrdom of Croatia and of the firm resolve of Croatians everywhere to seek now and to secure forever that nation's independence from Yugoslavia. Last December, the Honorable D. P. Moynihan mentioned the Croatian liberation movement in an electric exchange with Yugoslavia's U.N. ambassador.

This spring, on the issue of U.S. military aid to Yugoslavia, you read, perhaps, of the efforts of Croatian Americans to reverse the Defense Department's disastrously complacent, if not eager, planned sale of arms to Tito.

You have certainly read recently of the Laszlo Toth case in which an American citizen was obscenely convicted by a Yugoslav court. Toth languished for months in prison before our ambassador in Belgrade, Laurence Silberman, could obtain his release. Over, sadly, the objection of some in the State Department for whom convenient "friendly relations" seem to outrank justice.

But, fellow Americans, you have almost certainly not yet read of the Bleiburg-Maribor tragedy in which hundreds of thousands of Croatians were slaughtered, after the end of hostilities in 1945, by Tito's partisans!

Nor have you been shown the repression of the Catholic and Muslim faiths in Croatia and the imprisonment and liquidation of their clergy.

Nor have you probably learned of the brutal suppression in 1971 of the "Croatian Spring" and wholesale imprisonment of thousands of Croatian intellectuals, students, lawyers and artists.

These tyrannies go on, and on, in Croatia. But Belgrade's anti-Croatian persecution does not stop at Yugoslavia's borders. The vicious, criminal harassments of the UDBA, Tito's secret police, are well-known in every place of Croatian exile, including these sovereign United States.

Because these Croatian issues, above all that of our native struggle to establish our own independent state, do not pass the convenience test, the Congress and State Department bureaucracies, and the media they feed, have not troubled to apply those same standards of right, by which the United States has ever wanted to be known, to Croatia.

Now, fellow Americans, we want you to know that we have set ourselves to the deliverance of our Croatia from her bondage to Belgrade. To Croatia, we pledge our lives in this struggle, and to you we pledge always to give the truth, without which there can be no worthy America, nor that best warrant of Western strategic interests in the Mediterranean, a free Croatia.

Pro Football Preview: TV Curb Is Sought

By WILLIAM N. WALLACE Pro football has been having its cake and eating it too for a long time now. The owners of the teams have been selling their games twice, once at their ticket offices and a second time to the three television networks, while millions of fans have enjoyed the games for free, thanks to television, without buying a ticket.

son are expected to have the N.F.L.'s first $4 million payroll. A $2 million payroll was considered to be high five years ago. Season-ticket sales have shrunk by about 160,000 since 1973, which is a 12 percent drop worth about $1.6 million. Attendance at exhibition games this summer has plummeted, averaging less than 38,000 compared with 54,000 in 1973 and down from 42,500 a year ago.

works for more money when new contract negotiations begin later in the year and the networks in turn will seek more privileges. The chance to curb television could come should the Congress in the next two weeks forget or fail to renew the expired blackout law, the one that forbade the blacking out of home games that had been sold out 72 hours in advance. Although the N.F.L. has promised to continue lifting home blackouts of soldout games, it could change the policy and resume blacking out all home contests, as it did up to 1973, with no exceptions. The idea would be to end what Rozelle called "erosion" of the product and pressure fans to see the home team live.

nationally. The schedule this season is most attractive. So the N.F.L. has trapped itself into providing the most attractive games to television, to earn the $80 million it receives, and needing to entice more fans to pay to see the games. Close division rates would help, but the prospects there are only fair. Nine teams of a total of 26—now 28 with the addition of Seattle and Tampa Bay—have taken 23 of the 24 playoff positions open in the last three seasons. So expect the "have" teams to be back again in December, Baltimore or Miami, Pittsburgh or Cincinnati and certainly Oakland in the American Conference, Los Angeles, Minnesota, Dallas, St. Louis or Washington in the National.

College Football Preview: Battle of Runners

By GORDON S. WHITE Jr. Step by step and yard by yard, the runs of Ricky Bell and Tony Dorsett will be carefully catalogued and compared during the 108th college football season that starts this week with a smattering of games. Dorsett of Pittsburgh and Bell of Southern California begin their expected race for the Heisman Trophy on Sept. 11 when most major teams open their campaigns. Not since Pat Sullivan of Auburn beat out Ed Marinaro of Cornell for the 1971 Heisman Trophy after a season of outstanding accomplishments and bushels of publicity releases has there been such an inviting two-man race for the trophy as seems to be stirring between Dorsett and Bell.

players competing for Heisman recognition to spice the race that may boil all fall. In the case of Dorsett vs. Bell 1976, both are running tailbacks with strong teams. Bell is big and strong, Dorsett is medium size and strong. Dorsett can break Archie Griffin's college-career rushing record of 5,177 yards, set at Ohio State, because the Pitt senior enters this season with 4,134 yards. Bell can't compare in career yards because he played linebacker as a freshman and blocking fullback in his sophomore season. But Bell had 1,875 yards rushing in 1975 to 1,544 for Dorsett as they ran first and third in the nation. Herb Lusk of Long Beach State, now graduated, was second in rushing. Runners capable of challenging Bell and Dorsett include Fred Williams of Arizona State (1,316 yards in 1975), Mike Voight of North Carolina (1,250), Wendell Tyler of U.C.L.A. (1,216), Earl Campbell of Texas (1,118), and a wish-bone quarterback, Nolan Cromwell of Kansas (1,124). But even before some of these and hundreds of other fine backs get to run for daylight, there is court action to be settled. This is the second straight year that legal maneuvering, involving college football coaches, has taken place just before the opening of the season. This time it is assistant coaches at the University of Alabama and the University of Oklahoma Board of Regents, who are taking court action against the National Collegiate Athletic Association. They are contesting the N.C.A.A.'s new rule that limits a major-college football coaching staff to eight full-time assistants and places other restrictions on staff help. In Oklahoma City last week, a state judge ruled that the N.C.A.A. could not force Oklahoma to reduce its coaching staff. The N.C.A.A. indicated it would appeal. Alabama went to court a year ago to fight the N.C.A.A. limitations on the size of a team's traveling squad. Alabama lost in court but won at the N.C.A.A. convention last January when the travel limits were lifted. Team achievements this fall should follow the general trend of recent seasons with just a couple of new faces returning to the top after a long struggle to get there. These are Maryland, which may have arrived after five years of reconstruction by Jerry Claiborne, and Pittsburgh, also rebuilt by a similar program under Johnny Majors. The Terps and Panthers, who have been climbing toward the top 10, are starting with many of the players who earned them impressive bowl victories last winter. Michigan may be on top instead of second in the two-way race against Ohio State for the Big Ten title. And the Wolverines may be the best in the land. But they still have to beat Woody Hayes's team.

Mets Win, 2-1, on Run in 9th; Yanks Set to Rehire Martin

By THOMAS ROGERS The Mets were matched against the hottest team in major league baseball yesterday afternoon at Shea Stadium where they opposed the Los Angeles Dodgers in the second of a three-game series. The Dodgers, who had taken the opener, had won 10 of their last 11 games and had moved into a vaguely contending position in the National League's Western Division. But the Dodgers did their cause no good yesterday, committing four infield errors to help the Mets to a 2-1 victory. The winning run scored in the ninth on errors by Bill Russell and Steve Garvey and an infield hit by Felix Millan that broke a 1-1 tie. The Dodgers, who trailed the leading Cincinnati Reds by eight games with a little more than five weeks remaining on the schedule, had picked up 5 1/2 games in less than two weeks because of their recent spurt. During the same time, the Reds lost 8 of 13 games. During the Dodgers' hot streak the Mets had been their victims four times—three one-run losses last week in Los Angeles and in the current series opener on Friday night, 5-2. Over the season, the Dodgers had a

ANAHEIM, Calif., Aug. 28—Billy Martin, who was dismissed from his first three major league managing jobs, soon will receive a new, multi-year contract from the Yankees, possibly for three years. The subject of Martin's rehiring was raised recently when the Houston Astros rewarded Bill Virdon, the man Martin replaced in New York, with a new contract. The Boston Red Sox also gave Don Zimmer, their interim manager, a contract for next year, but the Yankees hadn't discussed the future with Martin, who has had the team in first place all season. However, Martin disclosed today that he talked with George Steinbrenner, the principal owner, earlier this week and they expected to settle the situation when the team returns from this trip. The trip began last night with the Yankees defeating the California Angels, 5-0, in a 15-inning game, the Yankees second-straight overtime affair. They edged Minnesota in 19 innings Wednesday night, which means they have won their last two games in 34 innings and nine hours 32 minutes. By NEIL AMDUR Special to The New York Times. SOUTH ORANGE, N.J., Aug. 28—Top-seeded Ilie Nastase reached the final of the $60,000 Tennis Week open today with a 2-6, 6-1, 6-2 victory over Balazs Taroczy of Hungary. The 30-year-old Nastase will oppose the winner of the second semifinal between second-seeded Onny Parun of New Zealand for the $10,000 men's singles first prize. Another No. 1 entry, Marise Kruger, reached the final of the women's singles at the Orange Lawn Tennis Club. The 18-year-old South African defeated Florence Guedy of France, 6-3, 6-2. The second women's semifinal paired Dr. Renee Richards against Lea Antonopolis, 17, of Glendora, Calif. The 42-year-old Dr. Richards was beaten, 6-7, 6-3, 6-0. The tiebreaker was the second in the tournament for Dr. Richards, who had said, "I'm a very good tiebreaker player." The former New York City ophthalmologist had beaten Khy Harter, 7-1, in a tiebreaker in the quarterfinal round. Miss Antonopolis was the second teen-age opponent for Dr. Richards, who had defeated 15-year-old Caroline Stoll of Livingston, N.J., in the second round. Miss Antonopolis is ranked third nationally in the 18's division and first in the 16's. She has played several top women on the pro tour; calls a victory over Jeanne Evert her "best win"; has a versatile game and has become a vegetarian to trim pounds from her husky 5-foot-5-inch, 138-pound frame. In the kind of match she had today, however, stroke production often is secondary to strategic skills, such as knowing to win specific points. Miss Antonopolis broke service at 15 for a 3-2 lead in the first set, only to make three unforced errors off the backhand and lose her serve. She escaped from 0-40 while serving at 3-4 and held after Dr. Richards had lost her calmness for the first time in the tournament. After pushing an easy fore-

Jets' Hill Is Shifted; Giants Off, Running

By GERALD ESKENAZI There was something—a rather large something—missing from the right side of the Jets' offensive line at Yankee Stadium last night. That was Winston Hill, who had been the New Yorkers' right tackle for the last 100 games or so. He was shifted to the left side against the Washington Redskins because of injuries to others. It is a position he may also play when the regular season starts in two weeks. But Hill can play the left side as adroitly as the right. It was the slot he was in from 1963 to 1970. Left or right, Hill has played in 181 straight regular-season games. "I forget," he likes to say, when asked how old he is. He will be 35 years old the end of October. It is an age when most professionals are settled in their careers, with perhaps only a long commute breaking up their days. For Hill, though, commuting is out of the question. Last year he moved his family to the Virgin Islands. "I'm in youth work in St. Croix," he said. "I took an extra day off a few weeks

The regular receivers didn't do much receiving in the Giant's first four preseason games. But with a three-game winning streak going into tonight's contest here against the Packers, they weren't complaining, either. "I just want to move the ball the best we can," said Tucker, the tight end. "As long as we win, I don't care what we do," said Gillette, a wide receiver. "It's a wide receiver's dream to have a running attack like this," said Rhodes, the other flanker. ah, for the good old days not long ago when the yanks didn't

By JOEL OPPENHEIMER

In 1941, age 11, one fine afternoon I went to visit aunt Gus and uncle Morris, alone, walking the hilly streets of Yonkers, while radios blared from every yard and open window, I heard the first World Series game I remember really hearing. It was a fine initiation, somewhere on Attin Drive, between two neat suburban houses, I heard it all as Mickey Owen dropped the fated third strike, the Yankees did it to me and the Dodgers, too, for the first time that day.

worse, there were roars around me, from the yards and living rooms as well as from the radio itself, it seemed as if all of Yonkers was screaming with joy. It's bad enough to be young and heartbroken, but to realize that the rest of your world has just achieved its heart's desire at the same moment is exquisitely painful.

the series went on, year after year, and so, in most of them, did the Yankees. In too many of them the Dodgers and I marched in confidently and limped off beaten. In most of the others it was another national league club that I'd temporarily identified with that limped off.

nothing worked. The Dodgers had a pitcher, big Don Newcombe, who could beat any of the 14 other clubs in both leagues, he was superb. He couldn't beat the Yankees. It was as if they had been recruited for the sole purpose of teasing off on him. Even the moments of glory, like Cookie's hit to steal Bill Beven's no-hitter and beat him in the process, or little all-giofriddo's miraculous catch off Dimaggio, all of them counted for nothing in the end.

when the Dodgers finally did win a series

'the series went on, year after year, and so... did the Yankees.'

it was too little and too late, at least as far as I was concerned, and they upped and moved to California while the Yanks kept winning.

so I'm used to it. I'm used to Yankee clubs that sew the pennant up in June, July, August. I'm used to smug looks on the faces of Yankee fans. I'm conditioned to the inevitable. I still don't like it. It's as bad as in 1976 as it was in all those other years, but I know the feeling well.

the last 10 years have been gravy, heaven, all that I could wish for. There were Yankee clubs that were laughable, there were Yankee clubs that promised and failed, there were Yankee clubs that almost made it, should have made it, could have made it—and didn't.

Yankee fans were quiet, a blessing at which I do not sneer, and maybe those fans were beginning to learn what the rest of us have known all along: nobody is a winner all the time. The young Yankee fans, the ones 24 and younger, they know this, and they're O.K. but the others, well, they've just taken a big breath this summer and they're back in business.

because the Yankees are on top again, way ahead and rolling, it doesn't matter that this is a club bought with cold hard cash instead of being built like the Yankee dynasty of old, self-perpetuating, always cranking out another star. It doesn't even matter that now they're just another club with more than a little bush in them instead of the nobility they once were.

they're still going to take their division, and maybe even the pennant. Of course I know they can't possibly beat Cincinnati or Philly, but that's an old feeling, too. I always knew the Yankees could be beaten, and they rarely were.

national league cities aren't we pose, and in the one American I know about they're not even paying. I've just come back from Maine this summer, red Sox fever ran wild this year, no one is paying attention, game doesn't exist, except as a ritual that gets announced night news with the same passion as readings for the day.

there's only one difference this time: the club is so new the fans can't all their names, so you head an whoisits and what-his-names in ajons, and no one has yet claimed rivers is dimaggio or that Stanley mar is the scooter, although I know year-olds who think Thurman miter than Bill Dickey.

well, we've been there before. we met fans, we national league it turns out that this Yankee club of another dynasty, we'll learn it, and besides, M. Donald keep he's going to buy us a dynasty, winter he will, so, we'll wait until it'll be a whole new ball game.

but for now, all we can do is keep our heads in and our mouths shut. This too will pass, but when time comes, I'll have to remember took 20 years to learn last time: at least, and don't take any free money bets. At even money Yankees, you were not only a fool.

The Secret of a Boxing Knockout as Expounded by a Belgian With a Strong N

By ULICK O'CONNOR

With all the controversy about brain damage in boxing, nobody seems to have actually found out what causes a knockout.

At one time I had a particular interest in this subject because I was appearing regularly in the ring. My father took the British Medical Journal, so I used to grab it as soon as it arrived in the hope of finding useful information on the matter.

The trouble was that the medical theories of the knockout were as diffuse as those about the existence of spacemen.

From the British Medical Journal I learned that Piffier (1922) thought that the cause of the knockout was a short-lived obstruction of the jugular vein; Flint (1930) believed that a distortion of the jaw produced a cerebral anaemia; Somen (1930-37) held (with Babinski concurring) that the knockout took place in the outer ear; La Cava (1957) maintained that a blow on the mandible on the side of the jaw led to a drop in nerve pressure. Barring the possibility that you were an octopus, it seemed impossible to concoct blows that would land in all these places at the same time.

Also, none of these medical theories seemed to coincide with a piece of empirical knowledge I gained when I was 18 in a boxing booth in Louvain, Belgium. I got to be there because that afternoon I had made a pig's ear of my event at an International Student Ullick O'Connor was undefeated as a British university boxing champion. He is better known as a poet, author and Abbey Theater playwright.

Games, and was looking for some way to work off my fury.

There was this ferocious Belgian who was offering a five to anyone who could put him down in three rounds, and in a rash moment I offered to take him on. A number of locals were coming out of the booth with lopsided jaws, which naturally encouraged my teammates to persuade me to get into the ring. It was about twice the size of a normal ring, so I was able to dodge my massive opponent for the first round.

Then, coming off the ropes in the second round, by a sheer fluke I caught him with the hardest punch I would ever land in a fight. I waited for him to fall, hoping I hadn't maimed him for life. All he did was grin and say affectionately:

"Iss no good, sonny. I don't fall." Which was true. I could have hit him on the chin with a sledgehammer, and it wouldn't have had any effect.

Afterward, in his den, he gave me a drink. He had been active in the Belgian Resistance and, assuming I was English, explained to me with enthusiasm how he used to break the necks of German storm troopers who gave him trouble.

I asked him his secret. He took me outside and showed me an enormous cannonball. Attached to it was a rope, which he suspended around his neck so that he could lift the cannonball with his neck. Now that he showed it to me, I noticed his neck muscles. They were massive. It would have taken two colars of mine placed end to end to go round it.

"Iss the secret," he explained, patting his neck.

Substantiated by Science

Some time after I had given up boxing, I came across a paper written in 1943 by an Oxford scientist that seemed to coincide with what the Belgian had told me. The scientist, A. H. Holburn, was investigating brain damage in car accidents, and he concluded that what caused it was not the force of the impact, but how fast the head was accelerated on the shoulder. In other words, a far steadier would have liddered with one that m move rapidly in one d boxer, therefore, had a was caught in a position muscles were relaxed, he be knocked out.

If Holburn's theory is the chances of concussion minimized by neck exerc help to keep the head when it comes in contact. My Belgian boxing in the hard school of E have stumbled on a p scientist, would later p years of patient analysi oratory.

The Olympics Revisited: Perfection and Crybabies

By RUSSELL J. DAVIS

Letters from readers about the Olympic Games indicate to me that the writers have never played any of the sports on the Olympic program, attended the Games or paid any attention to any of the Olympic sports except for a two-week period every four years.

Attempting to decide which of these letters is the dumbest is a difficult task indeed, but perhaps it is a tie between the masterpieces of Adam Redfield of New York and R. Seier of the Bronx, both of which appeared Aug. 15.

Redfield makes the peculiar argument that Nadia Comaneci is not a great athlete because she attains perfect scores. Not despite her perfect scores, because of them. One of the most incredible phenomena of recent years in sports is the barrage of criticism directed at Comaneci for possessing a normal, rather pleasant personality rather than satisfying the insatiable demands of the press and public by being "cute," "charming," "lovable" or hyperemotional. Redfield apparently approves of Ludmilla Turisheva, who has a somewhat similar personality, simply because she is not quite as good a gymnast and does not get perfect scores. Athletes should never worry about cheating an image to satisfy the public.

R. Seier dismisses all Americans as "crybabies." I would like to hear one concrete example of what he is talking about. No doubt the remarks of Shirley Babashoff will be brought up for the millionth time; certainly the pompous, righteous jerks have had a field day picking her apart for her perhaps unfortunate remarks about the East German female swimmers.

It is not being a "crybaby" or an "ugly American" to criticize unfair, politically motivated officiating that destroys the chances of athletes who have worked and sacrificed for years. Such officiating should be attacked again and again until something is done about it. And perhaps something has been done about it, to some extent, since the officiating at Montreal appeared to be of a much higher quality than that at Munich. There were some exceptions, notably in diving and in men's gymnastics, but generally speaking there were fewer official atrocities at the Montreal Games.

Nor is it being a "crybaby" or an "ugly American" to criticize the win-at-all-cost philosophies of the Communist nations or the fact that they operate under a totally different set of rules from ours. Certainly our sports programs must be improved, for both men and women. They're archaic and irrational. But there are obviously limits to the price we want to pay in personal freedom or individual well-being to achieve greater Olympic success.

I can't believe Americans support our athletes because we consider the Olympics as an arena for demonstrating the superiority of the American Way. That is absurd. We support these athletes for the same reasons we support the Philadelphia Phillies, the Michigan Wolverines or whatever teams we support: They're our athletes.

Most of us probably do think the American Way, severely flawed though it may be, is superior to that of other nations. But we don't need the Olympics to prove it to ourselves, and the Olympics will not prove that our way of life is superior. Indeed, the Olympics clearly demonstrate that, for producing gold medals, a totalitarian system of government is superior.

This does not mean that we don't appreciate outstanding performances of athletes from other countries, including the Communist nations. All of the Americans I saw at the Games warmly and unreservedly applauded the winning efforts of non-Americans. Many of them, for example, were so impressed by Lasse Viren's feat that they were rooting for him to win the marathon as well, although Frank Shorter was one of the favorites and would have been a deserving winner.

Naturally, the biggest demonstrations were in response to American victories and other good performances by Americans, but this is only natural. Among 99 percent of our athletes, I believe the response to opponents' performances was equally positive.

If R. Seier is so obsessed with the concept of "ugliness," he should have seen the crowds at the 1975 Pan-American Games in Mexico or the 1973 World University Games in Moscow.

I am convinced that there is no R. Seier and that his was a crank letter.

Mailbox: On South Africa

To the Sports Editor:

In the worldwide sport and politics controversy aroused by South Africa, what has often been ignored or overlooked is that South Africa has repeatedly been charged, found guilty and condemned for its policies and practices of racism in sport.

At Montreal during the recent Olympic Games three world sports bodies at their annual meetings voted to expel South Africa because of its continuing racially discriminatory practices in sport. I.A.A.F. (track and field), F.I.F.A. (soccer) and F.I.N.A. (swimming) now exclude South Africa from all international competition.

Full hearings were held, with testimony offered by representatives defending South Africa. However, nonwhite South African leaders, who oppose racism in sport, could not present their views, having been denied passports by their government. This final drastic step was taken following several years of suspension. Many other sports bodies have suspended or expelled South Africa or both.

South Africa has been barred from participating in the Olympic Games since 1964 and was formally expelled by the Olympic Committee in 1970 for not upholding the basic Olympic principle, which states that all athletes be selected to represent their country on meritorious performance in open competition.

Why does international tennis stand as the last bastion for white racism in sport? It is shameful that United States tennis authorities not only ignore all pleas to end collaboration with South Africa, but also have taken a role in leadership in defending South Africa and condemning those nations, such as

Complex Opens Trot Track Wednesday

By STEVE CADY

FORD, N. J., Sept. 28 (AP)—A rent meeting runs through Oct. 13, is expected to suffer more than Roosevelt Raceway, on Long Island, from the new competition across the Hudson River in the Hackensack Meadowslands. A third of the fans at Yonkers come from New Jersey. And the new track here has just arranged special bus transportation from 29 locations in Northern New Jersey and Manhattan.

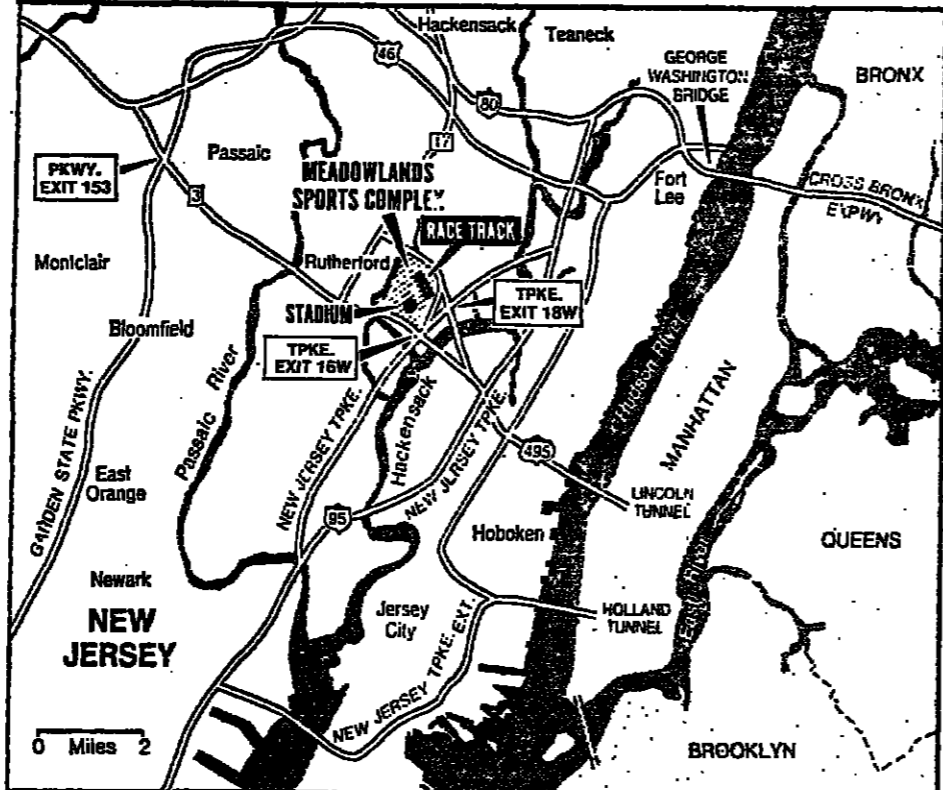

But David (Sonny) Werblin, chairman of the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority, insists his new track wants nothing more than its fair share of the market.

"We're not competitive, we're compatible," said Werblin, one of the master planners who kept the Sports Complex venture afloat. "We have not established this beautiful edifice to knock anybody out of business."

The racetrack, designed to handle crowds of up to 35,000, is merely a workhorse born to pay off the massive bond issue that financed the complex. Gambling revenue will pay for both the track and the showpiece of the complex: a 76,500-seat football stadium that will provide a fancy home for the New York Jets, starting with an Oct. 10 game against the Dallas Cowboys.

Bonds were sold after New Jersey created the Sports Authority in 1972 and gave it virtual blank-check liberties with parimutuel revenue. Instead of its usual hefty share of parimutuel revenue, the state gets only a half-percent of the handle from racing operations conducted by the Authority.

A Challenge Answered
Taxpayer groups, unhappy about setbacks in programs such as state aid to education, have challenged the Sports Complex as a boondoggle. But its supporters insist it will pay off for New Jersey over the long run in the form of big-league prestige, economic growth and the environmental rehabilitation of a polluted marshland.

area larger than the island of Manhattan.

"We're in the middle of an area with a population of something like 18 million people," said Werblin, the former president of both the New York Jets and Monmouth Park. "If we provide better entertainment than the New York tracks, we'll outdo them."

In Werblin's view, the best time to provide entertainment is when the most people are available. That means night racing, and the Authority appears to be leaning toward night action for the thoroughbreds as well as the harness horses.

Citing what he called "historical dates," Werblin said his new track would apply for the last three weeks in August as a regular part of its thoroughbred season. August is when New York racing at Aqueduct or Belmont Park shifts to upstate Saratoga. The application for August dates could stir a fight with Monmouth, the resort track at Oceanport, N. J. But Werblin said Monmouth's regular August dates never went beyond Aug. 10.

In harness racing, the big difference for horses, drivers and horseplayers at Meadowlands will be the one-mile track. Most harness tracks offer a half-mile racing surface, going twice around for the standard one-mile race. Form supposedly holds up better on a one-mile harness track, where the horses and drivers have more room to maneuver. Horses also are said to stay sounder because the turns aren't so sharp, and there are only two of them instead of four.

Another advantage, both for management and long-shot players, is a wider stretch that will permit 10 horses to line up across the track behind the mobile starting gate. On a half-mile track, it's eight-across. The larger fields at Meadowlands are expected to contribute to bigger payoffs in the exactas and triple.

Scenically, the Meadowlands track still looks a bleak in a virtually treeless landscape. But Jack Krumpke, executive director of the Authority, noted that site landscaping would eventually soften the starkness. Most of the 40,000 shrubs, trees and plants have not yet been put in place.

"At this stage," said Krumpke, "we can't begin to thank the rank-and-file workers who got things built on time. All the unions involved have been outstanding. We're forever grateful for their cooperation."

All the Meadowlands needs now is the cooperation of the horseplayers.

Play Third Base and Live

Every time a life insurance company flings up another skyscraper like the Prudential Building in Boston or John Hancock Center in Chicago, it is a reminder that the money for these majestic towers comes from making book on people's lives. The insurance company bets you that you will live longer than its agents have suggested, and it wins because it is strictly a chalk player. The horse player who ruins his eyes poring over past performances is a mere beginner alongside the actuaries who study form on people.

Sports of The Times

Thus when statisticians with Metropolitan Life tell us that major league baseball players live longer than average men and that third basemen live longer than shortstops, we can believe they know what they're talking about. And that's exactly what the company's bulletins do tell us. Here are the figures:

The mortality ratio of players who made the majors after 1900 is only 71 percent as high as that of the general white male population. (Blacks were left out of the study because they haven't been in the majors long enough for their mortality rate to mean much.)

The rates for third basemen is only 55 percent, for shortstops it is 67, for pitchers and first basemen 79. As might be expected, for we all know worry is bad for you, managers live only a shade longer than shoe salesmen. Their ratio is 92 percent, and that includes Connie Mack, whose career as manager spanned 57 years and who died two weeks short of his 94th birthday.

Players enshrined in the Hall of Fame live longer than managers but die sooner than humpy-dumppies. Their mortality rate is 82 percent. Probably that should read immortality rate.

'Hot Corner,' They Call It

Assurance that third base is the safest position on the field will be news to some who played there against right-handed pull hitters like Joe DiMaggio, Rogers Hornsby and Hank Greenberg. It should bring a guffaw from Dario Lodigiani, an infielder with the Philadelphia Athletics and Chicago White Sox before and shortly after World War II. With Bill Werber serving a suspension, the Athletics were opening a series in Boston when Connie Mack looked down the bench. "Well," he said, "I haven't got a third baseman." He let the statement hang there.

"It was looking right at me," Lodigiani said later. Lodi was a second baseman by birth and preference. "All right, damnit," he said. "Gimme that glove, I'll chance it."

Boston's leadoff hitter was Doc Cranner, a left-hander who sprayed his hits. He swung late and the ball whistled down to third on one mean hop. Gritting his teeth, Lodi blocked it with his chest and threw the man out. Joe Cronin stepped up, a right-hander. Unaccustomed to seeing him so close up, Lodi mistook him at first for Man Mountain Dean. "Oh-oh," the new third baseman said softly, and took a step back. It seemed to him that the crack of the bat the thud of something hitting his chest were simultaneous. He scrambled around, found a ball and threw the man out.

Jimmy Foxx batted third. The Beast they called him. He was hitting .349 that year with 50 home runs and 175 runs batted in. There were dents all over the left-field wall. Lodi took two steps back. He never really saw the ball. He saw Foxx swing, saw third base ripped from its moorings and heard a whir beside his right ear.

Foxx went into second standing up. Lodi looked at the bag lying loose at his feet. He looked down at his chest.

Dario Lodigiani in 1942
Third basemen die younger

He looked into the dugout. Connie had his score card up before his face to hide his laughter.

If the late Fresco Thompson had played third regularly he might be alive today but he was a second baseman who filled in at third for the Brooklyn Dodgers in only one series. It was against the Cardinals whose left fielder was right-handed Chick Haley. When Chick hit a line drive you could see the bat bend. First time he came up, Fresco was playing back on the grass. Haley bunted and jogged safely to first. When the inning ended, Fresco got a dime and called a kid selling icecream cones.

A Cone for Mr. Hafey

"Take a cone to Mr. Hafey," he said. "Tell him it's from Mr. Thompson, and that if he bunts again he'll get another."

This sort of evidence makes one wonder about the actuarial figures, although a guy who can't add his expense account has no right questioning the pros. Perhaps their tables explain the special case of Jack Lohrke, a third baseman who came up to the New York Giants in the late 1940's. He was known as Lucky Lohrke, a name he detested, because when he was playing for Spokane he missed the team bus the day it was in a highway crash that killed a number of players. Now we learn that it wasn't mere luck; if he had caught the bus it could have thrown the figures on third baseman out of joint.

Other findings by the actuaries seem reasonable. Most ballplayers who make the majors are in good health and most keep themselves fit. The higher mortality rate among pitchers and first basemen may have something to do with the fact that not all of them are real athletes. A pitcher can be a fat man with a rubber arm, like Bobo Newsum, and when some brute of a hitter comes along who is as slow and awkward as, say, Zeke Bonura, he always winds up playing first. ("My pet ox," Jimmie Dykes called Zeke.)

It would be interesting to know how the insurance people reckoned the ages of ballplayers, for this is privileged information that the athletes guard jealously. One fall when the Reds were in the World Series, they wheeled out the oldest living slumdog of the club, an outfielder named Dummy Hoy, to throw out the first ball.

"Dummy Hoy," said Joe Garagiola on the air, "99 years old! I wonder if that's his real age or his baseball age."

Joe McCarthy Remembers

The telephone rang the other day in a house in Tonawanda in upstate New York, and 89-year-old Joe McCarthy answered it and said: "I'm pulling for them. Once a Yankee, always a Yankee."

He meant the New York Yankees, who are nearly 3,000 miles away this weekend in California turning into the final five weeks of the season — the season that seems destined to restore them to the top of their particular heap after 12 summers of wandering through the wilderness of baseball. It's been the longest stretch of wandering in more than half a century for the most successful ball club in modern times. They joined the American League in 1903, won nothing for 18 years and then skyrocketed in 1921 after the arrival of Babe Ruth: 20 pennants and 20 world championships in the next 45 years.

During that long run of prosperity, the Yankees won most of their titles under three managers. They took six pennants under Miller Huggins in the 1920's in the days of Ruth, Herb Pennock, Bob Meusel and eventually Lou Gehrig; then eight under McCarthy in the era of Joe DiMaggio, and finally 10 under Casey Stengel in the time of Mickey Mantle and Whitey Ford.

After that, they won three more for Ralph Houk and another for Yogi Berra while the talent began to dry up and the balance of power shifted. But since 1964, nothing. And no manager held the job longer than Joseph Vincent McCarthy, a stocky Philadelphian who showed neither the anxiety of Huggins nor the theatrics of Stengel. After 20 years as a player or manager in the minor leagues and five as boss of the Chicago Cubs, he called the shots for the Yankees for 15 seasons starting in 1951.

By the time he retired to his farm near Buffalo, he had become the first manager to win pennants in both major leagues and the first to win the World Series four times in a row, which the Yankees did from 1926 through 1939. They missed the pennant by two games the next year, but then won three more pennants and two more World Series before the upheaval of World War II. No wonder they're trembling up at the Stadium this summer.

Man With All the Buttons
He was a "push button manager" in Jimmie Dykes, who used to wish that he could push the same buttons. He was a master of basic baseball to DiMaggio, who observed that "never a day went by that you didn't learn something from McCarthy." Toward the end of his career, he was a problem to the free-wheeling Joe Page, who said: "I hated his guts, but there was never a better manager."

"The only time I get to see them is on TV," Joe McCarthy was saying on the telephone the other day, more than a quarter of a century after he had called it quits. "I see them once in a while when they're on the network. Mostly we get the Canadian stations, so I hear Duke Snider broadcasting the Montreal Expos' games. Snider's very good. He knows the game and he doesn't talk too much."

What's the difference between the 1976 Yankees and the old ones? You know, like his 1936-39 bunch, which won 409 games of 610 played and also swept four World Series while losing only four games.

"They seem to have more speed now," he said, looking for a delicate way to measure all that old power. "They run more. Maybe they have to run more. I can't make any comparsions, though. Once I had five championship teams with five different first basemen. It's like when I was managing the Boston Red Sox in later years, and people would ask me who was the better player, Joe DiMaggio or Ted Williams. How could I answer that? "The designated hitter? I don't know, but I like to see the pitcher come to bat. If they get the designated runner on top of the designated hitter, they can do without the manager. The bat-boy could manage the club then. Who would've been the designated hitter on my clubs in the Thirties? They were all designated hitters in those days."

Old Yankees Fade Away
The only World Series that the Yankees lost during McCarthy's reign was in 1942, when the St. Louis Cardinals beat them in five games. A year later, DiMaggio and many of the regulars were in military service, attendance fell to 645,000 and the Yankees took the field with people like Nick Etten at first base, Billy Johnson at third and Johnny Lindell in center field. He must have pushed the right buttons, anyway. They won the pennant and beat the Cardinals in five games in the Series.

Since then, baseball has evolved into a business with 24 teams and free agents, 10 men on a side in one league and nine in the other, night games in the playoffs and World Series, and wall-to-wall announcers who talk too much, unlike Duke Snider. There are times when Joe McCarthy can follow the plot but not the cast.

"I don't know anybody in the Yankee organization now but Gabe Paul," he said. "It didn't take him long to get in and start operating, did it? Billy Martin came after me, and the only manager I know in the American League is Houk. "About every 10 or 15 years in baseball, you get a new bunch. Frank Crosetti drops me a line once in a while, but you lose contact with people. Old Yankees, they disappear."

It was just before the Yankees got into their extra-inning madness that Martin first discussed his Yankee managerial future with Steinbrenner, who not too long before had brought Dick Williams onto the Yankee scene and raised Martin's ire. But now it's certain that Martin and Williams will manage the team next year.

"I think it will be resolved the way I'd like it," said Martin, who would like a three-year contract.

Steinbrenner gave no reason for anyone to believe otherwise.

"You can't ask for more from a manager than Billy has given us," Steinbrenner said from his home in Tampa, Fla. "He is completely cooperative and keeps us informed all the way. I wouldn't anticipate any problems with him. He's been outstanding. He'll be back next year."

The owner didn't want to discuss the length of Martin's contract, but he is not opposed to multiyear contracts. When he hired Williams in 1974 (only to have Charles O. Finley, Williams's previous employer in Oakland, veto the deal), Steinbrenner was giving him a three-year contract.

Steinbrenner also has given four of his players—Calfish Hunter, Thurman Munson, Ken Holtzman and Craig Nettles—contracts of three to five years, and more multi-year deals can be expected under baseball's new labor agreement.

"His reaction wasn't all that bad," Martin said, discussing his request for a three-year contract. "I think a manager has to have it when players are getting three- and four-year contracts. I think it's most important, if you want the manager to keep his head above the players, for the players to know that the manager is going to be here. Not only are the players getting paid twice as much as you are, but their contracts are longer."

Ice Hockey Teams of 6 Nations Open Play Thursday

INTERNATIONAL ice hockey could impact on the fortunes of North America as did the League's 77, begins the Canada Cup together with the final game of the world hockey tournament.

Curt Bennett of the Atlanta Flames, left; Steven Jensen of the Minnesota North Stars, center, and Rick Chartrow of the Montreal Canadiens will play for the United States.

that culminated in a stupendous contract with the Chicago Black Hawks. Players are eligible to compete in the Canada Cup for the country of their citizenship or birth, and so the Swedish and Finnish teams are welcoming back for this tournament only many players who left their amateur national teams to turn professional with W.H.A. or N.H.L. clubs.

The professional league's long, solid and money-making schedules had led to a kind of isolationism for North American hockey, so Team Canada's four coaches are ecstatic over this chance to make contact with their European peers.

"Coaching hockey is done behind closed doors," said Scotty Bowman, who guided the Montreal Canadiens to the Stanley Cup championship last season. "There are no symposiums, no clinics. We just swap ideas. A coach is going to be able to gain a lot of experience in this tournament." The Canada Cup is the culmination of a lot of small steps that North American teams have taken toward joining the circle of international hockey. Many North American teams carry foreign players on their negotiating lists, and Czechoslovakia has given the Phoenix Roadrunners of the W.H.A. permission to talk after this tournament with three of the Czechoslovak team's top olders on their roster, and the Roadrunners are holding their training camps in Europe this September and will play exhibition games against European teams there. The origins of this consolidation lie in the 1972 Team Canada series against the Soviet Union, which was followed by a W.H.A. series against the Soviet team in 1974. Then, last January, two Soviet hockey clubs toured North America and whetted fans' appetites for international play. Bowman and Bobby Kromm, who coached Winnipeg to the W.H.A. championship, feel that the Canada Cup may spoil hockey players and fans.

"I think international hockey is going to be the thing," said Bowman. The spectators are going to demand it. "Sometimes it hurts going back to your own schedule if you've been through a super series," said Kromm. "After this, it may be hard to appreciate some other regular-season games. You have to remember, Team Canada has the 30 premier players in the world. You can't expect that all the time."

In a roster released to Tass, the Soviet news agency, and in an interview in Soviet sports, a Soviet Hockey Federation official indicated that the Russians would be sending a younger, somewhat experimental team to the Canada Cup instead of the seasoned squad that won at the Olympics last winter. Missing from the roster are a number of experienced players, including Alexander Yakushev, Vladimir Shadrin, Boris Mikhailov, Vladimir Petrov, Yuri Liapkin and Valery Kharlamov, who fractured his left ankle late last May.

Karen Hantze Susman after winning 1962 Wimbledon title by beating Vera Sukova of Czechoslovakia, right, in final. Mrs. Susman will play at Forest Hills this week, her first tournament in two years and her first U.S. Open in 10 years.

Karen Susman Will Return to Action at Forest Hills Season

Her daughter, Shelley, is 13 years old and doing nicely, thank you. Her husband, Rod, is secure selling insurance. So when Karen Hantze Susman started thinking about what she wanted to do, at age 33, her first thoughts naturally drifted to tennis.

"I decided it would be fun to try to compete again," the former Wimbledon singles champion said by phone the other day from her home in San Diego. "The last time I played a tournament was January, 1974 to get my feet wet for team tennis that year. I guess I'm going to get my feet wet again at Forest Hills."

The ninth United States Open championships will begin a 12-day run starting Wednesday at the West Side Tennis Club in Forest Hills, Queens. A field of 128 men and 96 women will play for the $30,000 singles prizes in each division.

Total prize money for the world's richest tennis tournament will be $416,000. Officials of the United States Tennis Association report the biggest advance ticket sale and corporate sponsorship in history, with the final four days and the first Sunday afternoon already sold out.

About 3,000 tickets still remain for Sept. 3 and 4, U.S.T.A. officials said yesterday, with approximately 4,000 tickets left for Sept. 5. "For the first time in 10 years, we are running well ahead of last year," the official added.

The last time Karen Susman played Forest Hills—12 years ago—a trophy, expenses and home hospitality were the objects of the players' affections. The concept of open tennis, with amateur progressives such as Edward A. Turville and Edward C. (Ned) Potter, their late historian.

To the thousands of newcomers who have taken up the sport in recent years, the name Karen Susman means nothing.

Chris Evert or Evonne Goolagong, the two top-seeded women at this year's tournament. Yet in 1960, 1961 and 1962, Mrs. Susman was the No. 2-ranked women's single player in the United States behind Darlene Hard, and in 1962 she won the women's singles and doubles (with Billie Jean King) at Wimbledon.

Mrs. Susman was admitted to this year's women's draw, without having to play any qualifying matches this weekend, as a "wild-card" entry, a provision adopted under revised tournament rules at the discretion of the tournament committee. Her first match will be against 17-year-old Lea Antonopolis of Glendora, Calif.

"I'm very excited about coming to play," Karen said, although she has had little time to familiarize herself with the slower clay-like playing surface at West Side. "I really don't know how well I'll do, but it will be something different. Rod and I are looking forward to coming East again."

Mrs. Susman, who said she hoped to be able to play tournaments on the U.S.T.A. features tour next season, will find more than prize money, expanded draws, larger crowds and clay courts instead of grass at Forest Hills. Night matches again will be played for the first eight days, and competition also will be held concurrently in juniors, men's 35 singles and men's 45 doubles.

"It'll be something different from washing dishes or vacuuming the house," said Mrs. Susman, who played primarily in doubles during her season in World Team Tennis.

Miss Evert and Manuel Orantes of Spain are the defending singles champions, but injuries may have something to say about their ability to repeat.

From the standpoint of early interest, the opening days will be filled with a number of potentially exciting first-round men's singles matches such as John Newcombe vs. Bob Lutz, Cliff Richey vs. Harold Solomon, Jan Kodes vs. Phil Dent, Sandy Mayer vs. Corrado Barazzutti, Eddie Dibbs vs. Charles Pasarell, John Alexander vs. Buster Mottram, Ilie Nastase vs. Onny Parun and Jimmy Con Hewitt.

In women's early eye-opens follows Betty St. Anthony, Maritona vs. Jan Evonne Goolagong Ziegenfuss at Chmyreva vs. Because of number of entries for the women's single play during days.

A field of 11 will play off to the men's draw day at these clubs: Glen H. Club, Glen Oak Club, Pine Hill Club, Shore Tennis Washington; Ts Brookville. Th men's qualify tomorrow and Tu played at the Club.

U.S. Reaches Semifinals Of Federation Cup Tennis

By TONY KORNHEISER
Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 28—They walked off the court as fresh as anti-parapirants and to inexperienced opposition. Billie Jean King and Rosemary Casals had not been pushed by their opponents; they had barely been nudged. Their quarterfinal Federation Cup match against Switzerland ended, 3-0.

The United States thus advanced to the semifinals against the Netherlands.

Australia clinched a berth in the final by winning three singles against Britain, Dianne Fromholtz beat Sue Barker, 6-2, 7-6, and Evonne Goolagong defeated Virginia Wade, 6-1, 6-2.

No, the Swiss did not use all three of their players at the same time. Not that it might have made any difference.

"Hey, they're good," said Mrs. King after the 112-minute, six-set victory.

"They're the best team that we've played here so far," said Miss Casals.

True as that was, it was still charitable. Miss Casals needed only 44 minutes to defeat the 18-year-old Monika Simmen, 6-1, 6-1. Mrs. King needed only 35 to defeat the 17-year-old Petra Delhees, 6-2, 6-1. And the two Americans, playing their private game of "What Can We Do For An Encore?" needed only 33 minutes to dispatch Miss Simmen and Susi Eichenberger in the doubles, 6-0, 6-0.

The Swiss would have had better luck trying to change water into wine than beating the Americans. Mrs. King has been rated often in her career the finest woman tennis player in the world, and Miss Casals has often been rated in the top five. One of the Swiss women has even been drafted by World Team Tennis, which has wasted draft picks on persons such as Bill Cosby and Johnny Carson, and would presumably have drafted Sabu, the Elephant Boy, if he had expressed an interest in playing for San Diego.

In fact, it was an honor for the Swiss to be on the same court with Mrs. King and Miss Casals. Yesterday the Swiss team fought for the right to play the singles matches, knowing that no matter which two women were picked, they would lose badly.

The Swiss coach, Jeanine Bourgeois, took photographs of Mrs. King and Miss Casals during the matches.

"It is not every day we are near Casals and King," she said in honest awe. "I took pictures because it was such an occasion."

There was no embarrassment from the Swiss women. They had done their best against two superior professionals. They had been beaten badly, as expected.

"If I was Rosie, I'd have done the same thing to me," said Miss Simmen. "It would have been my job."

The appreciation of professionalism is widespread in women's tennis, especially in the Federation Cup, the women's equivalent of the Davis Cup, where there are such wide disparities in the abilities of the competing teams.

Neither Miss Casals nor Mrs. King would stoop so low as to try to take it easy on opponents. Miss Casals used a drop shot to win points when her opponent remained fixed, as if by adhesive, to the baseline. Mrs. King went to the net and slammed volleys for winning.

"I try to get it over with," Miss Casals said. "I think it's more embarrassing to lose to someone you know, is just feeding you balls."

"Look, I know how they feel," said Mrs. King, who arrived here at 4 A.M. this morning after helping the New York Sets win the W.T.T. championship, and got only four hours sleep. "You remember how it was when you were their age, and you know where they're at. If you get killed, you get killed; it's better when everybody plays their best."

Sets Take Crown With a 3-0 Sweep

By ROBIN HERMAN
Special to The New York Times

UNIONDALE, L.I., Aug. 27—In an atmosphere devoid of the requisite ingredients of a championship series—frenzied fans, banners and competition—the New York Sets swept the Golden Gaters, 31-13, tonight for their first West Coast Tennis title in the three-year history of the league.

They won the three-of-five-match series in three consecutive matches. Tonight a calm, collected crowd of 5,730, the Sets' third-largest crowd of the season, watched the team clinch the title.

For the first time, the finalists will receive some prize money for their accomplishments, but for the champions tonight there was no trophy presentation.

"There is a trophy," said Sol Berg, the Sets' owner. "But I really don't know where it is right now. It's not in the building."

Even without a trophy to gaze upon, Billie Jean King, named the series' most valuable female player, was satisfied. The W.T.T. title was the only tennis championship that had eluded her.

"This has really been of paramount importance to me for the last three years," she said.

Before the evening began the Golden Gaters faced the unlikely possibility that their top female doubles player, Betty Stove, might not make the match in time. Her limousine was fighting its way up the New Jersey Turnpike from Philadelphia in rush-hour traffic after Miss Stove had finished an afternoon match in the Federation Cup, Virginia Wade of the Sets had made a similar journey a few hours earlier. Miss Stove arrived at Nassau Coliseum at 7:30, a half-hour before match time.

The opening match of Mrs. King and Phil Dent versus Miss Stove and Fred McMillan ended in a 7-6 decision for New York after a 5-3 tie-breaker.

Then the Sets ran wild over the Western Division champions.

Sandy Mayer, using a wide variety of backhands, destroyed Tom Okker as he had in their two previous meetings of this series. This time the score was 6-1 as Okker showed a decided disinterest in hustling after Mayer's well-placed shots.

Then Mrs. King and Miss Wade defeated Francois Durr and Miss Stove, 6-2. The pleasant but most vocal in that match when a point for the Golden Gaters was called back and a let was explained. The umpire gave no explanation.

"Why?" called spectators. "Why?"

The fans never found out that Miss Wade had reported a double hit by Miss Stove and the latters' player had admitted the fault.

Miss Wade then defeated Miss Durr in the women's singles, 6-1. In the men's doubles, Dent and Mayer finished the evening with a 6-3 victory over McMillan and Okker.

"We played so well nobody would have been able to do anything against us," said Mayer, who was named the most valuable player of the championship series. "We were on top of them from the beginning. We never let them breathe."

Richards Bows in 3 Sets hand into the net on game point, Renee threw her racket to the ground in disgust. The capacity crowd of 3,500 gasped, apparently stunned by the gesture. A few boos were heard.

Dr. Richards, who had shown little emotion during her previous matches, then smiled to herself as she changed courts. She seemed almost relieved about the gesture, perhaps sensing an occasion to release some of the tension that she had felt from the publicity surrounding her transsexual status.

Miss Antonopolis had two more chances to take the first set. At 4-all, she led by 30-40 on Dr. Richards's serve.

After Renee had faulted the first serve, Lea drove a forehand return down the middle. The ball was well out, a careless shot considering the option she had had of going down the line for a winner.

Then she broke Dr. Richards for 6-5, but could not hold for the set as her left-handed opponent hit consecutive winners for the break from 20-all. The first was a running backhand pass down the line, and the second a forehand across court.

Dr. Richards opened the tiebreaker with a forehand passing shot down the line and quickly raced to a 5-0 lead.

Tarozzy has beaten some of the world's top players, including Arthur Ashe, on clay. He won the first set from Nastase with a combination of skillful baseline play and the Rumanian's impatience.

"I played well in the first set and concentrated well," the dark-haired Hungarian said. "But in the second set I play to much in a hurry and went to the net too much."

Nastase, explaining his futile first-set strategy, said: "I tried to play winners from the baseline. I was playing indoors last night, and I didn't get much practice today. If I play the same way in the second set, I lose again, so I just mix everything."

No one has the shot re-ertery to rival Nastase's. By improving his serve, with more depth and pace, he has strengthened his game even more.

"I think he's playing very well," said Tarozzy. "He has good passing shots, and his serve has improved a lot. He can do aces whenever he wants."

Nastase served eight aces, a high number for slow courts, and never came within a break point of losing his serve in the last two sets. He attributed part of his recent serving success to a shift in a rackets, from a four and five-eighths light to a medium.

Revamped L.F. Has a New In

By MARGARET ROACH

A year has passed since the Ladies' Professional Golf Association underwent a major remodeling process. The reorganization has taken the form of a new executive structure working out of a new location. A commissioner, Ray Volpe, was appointed to succeed the executive division, made up of players from the tour, which had previously governed the L.P.G.A. The association headquarters was moved from Atlanta to New York.

The new administration brought aspirations of change to the tour. It sought larger purses, better course sites for tournaments and increased exposure for women's golf. The association coined the term "the new L.P.G.A." as an expression of anticipated change. And, in fact, the L.P.G.A. has changed.

"I think the image of women's golf has changed," said Jan Stephenson, a 24-year-old native of Australia who is in her third year on the tour. "There are so many girls under 30—we have a fun, young image, not the old-fashioned image, women's golf used to have."

Miss Stephenson earned $21,000 in purses last year, and already this year has doubled that mark.

"It used to be all hard work and no rewards," Miss Stephenson recalled. "Now the L.P.G.A. believes in us, and it is worth the work. Someone appreciates the effort now."

A Record Purses Next Month

Miss Stephenson has benefited from the increased purses this year. In 1975, $1.4 million in prize money was offered. This year the total has doubled, to about $2.8 million, and the L.P.G.A. expects to offer more than $3 million next year.

The Carlton Grand Prix will be played Sept. 23 through 26 at the Calabasas Park Country Club in Los Angeles for a record $205,000 purse. The minimum first prize is $35,000. A percentage of the gate receipts will be added.

The richest event before this year's Carlton was the Colgate-Dinah Shore Winners Circle in April. The $185,000 tournament carried a $32,000 first prize.

The Carlton is limited to the top 90 players in the grand prize point standing. It is the last of this year's grand prize events, and a $5,000 bonus will be awarded at the tournament to the series leader. E Far East tour to Hong Kong Manila, it is all the women's tour.

Charity Served at Forest Hills As Celebrities Frolic on Court

By CHARLES FRIEDMAN

Put a tennis racket in the hands of a celebrity, team him with an established pro for a charitable cause and the result is an entertainment that drew 15,000 spectators to Forest Hills yesterday.

It was fun tennis at the annual Robert F. Kennedy pro-celebrity tournament, a prelude to the serious business of the United States Open championships, which begin Wednesday. There were backers galore, but here and there a sparkling forehand caught the line and a drop volley miraculously teased its way over the net.

"Bert Bachrach's a pretty good player," said one spectator after watching the composer unveil his repertoire in the stadium of the West Side Tennis Club.

"Look at the Senator!" shouted another as Jacob J. Javits got into a long rally on a tied court. The Senator finally flubbed a shot, grimaced and shot a look at the crowd as if hopeful they hadn't seen it.

O. J. Simpson had a lot of success with Clark Graebner a his doubles partner. But he wouldn't talk about his future in football. "I want to enjoy myself here," he said. He covered the court well, was very aggressive, but seemed to lack hand-to-eye coordination.

The West Side Club has redesigned its grounds in an effort to ease the congestion that usually occurs at the Open. But there seemed to be no difference, as the walkways swarmed with humanity, making it difficult to get close to the action.

Some people were asking if Dr. Renee Richards, the 42-year-old former Richard Raskind of New York who underwent a transsexual operation, would show up. She was playing in New Jersey, however. Don Dell of the Association of Tennis Professionals said the men's union would announce its position on the Richards case soon.

"I personally feel that a decision on her status should be made by a panel of medical experts," he said.

Mobbed by autograph seekers, Senator Edward M. Kennedy graciously obliged them, and said: "We've been very encouraged by the success of the tournaments. They show that people care about the ideals my brother was concerned about."

The event raises funds for underprivileged youth. Ethel Kennedy, widow of Robert F. Kennedy, who showed a lot of style on the court, said last year's tournament brought in more than $200,000.

It was hard work for the basketball players. Dave DeBusschere, who said he was looking for a job now that the American Basketball Association was finished, couldn't find the range with his backhand and kept staring at his racket in disgust. Bill Bradley was completely lost as he lunged and dived futilely for shots that whizzed by him. He looked embarrassed.

Alan King played with dash (between the kibbitzing), as did Rafer Johnson. They are old hands at celebrity tennis, which has blossomed all over the country through television exposure.

The spectators finally got their dessert when Arthur Ashe squared off with Dick Stockton. It was something after a day of hacking.

The Tennis Clinic How to Gain Tips: Watch Open on TV

By SHEPHERD CAMPBELL

For the next two weekends, some first-rate tennis instruction will be available right in your home.

No, Arthur Ashe or Chris Evert isn't going to drop in to give personal advice on how to get your serve in consistently or how to correct that wayward backhand. But they—and some other top players—will be appearing on the telecasts of the United States Open championships from Forest Hills, Queens.

And that offers club players a good opportunity to improve their games by watching how the best professionals play tennis.

You can make it out to the West Side Tennis Club to view them in person, so much the better. You can't hope to emulate leading pros; indeed, you shouldn't try. They are tremendously talented athletes, remember, and they've spent years perfecting their skills. You'd probably throw your arm out before long if you tried to hit a topspin forehand the way Bjorn Borg does.

Still, there are many valuable lessons to be learned if you watch a TV match with alertness and purpose.

If you're having problems with a particular stroke, you might concentrate on how some of the leading pros hit it. Or if you're constantly outfoxed on something like the return of serve, you can see what the stars do in the same situation. Or you can sit back and absorb the flow of the action, observing how the pros try to move each other around the court to gain the advantage.

Happily, the hacker who's looking to learn, the United States Open is now played on a slow, clay-like surface. That makes for a tempo of play that's much closer to the brand of tennis played at the club level than the slam-bang style the men used on the old grass courts at Forest Hills.

It means you have more time to check the players' preparations: that is, how they get their rackets back, their shoulders and sides to the net and their footwork. It also gives you a chance to watch court strategy more closely, to see how the players hit from side to side to keep an opponent moving and to observe how they wait for the chance to jump on a short ball and move to the net to finish off a point.

TV can't focus on as many instructive details as it might, of course, because of its obligation to show the full court most of the time during a match. That can make it difficult to pick up certain subtleties. But the cameras do often move in tight on the server, so it is possible for you to watch and learn at close range about that part of the game.

You can tell how well a player is serving, moreover, by noting the depth of his or her delivery. If the ball lands consistently deep in the service court, you'll know that player is serving well. If that's the case, watch what the receiver does to counteract it. Observe how he varies his position and/or type of return and apply it to your game when the same thing happens to you.

So don't be mesmerized by the metronome motion of the ball as it goes back and forth across the net during a TV match. Try to do more than keep track of the score and the service breaks. A little creative viewing can pay real dividends for your own game.

The Crowd Hails Kicks' Big Season

By ALEX YANNIS
"Crocketer is a Midas," a friend in Bloomington said. "He has those magic fingers. If he owned the Twins, the National League would want them."

The Kicks, with Freddie Goodwin as coach, started out poorly, got better and then played superbly. The crowd's just followed suit. When 46,164 showed up to see the team in a loss to Pelé and the Cosmos, some said it wouldn't happen again, that it was a coincidence so many people had showed up for a soccer game. Part of Crocketer's success is that he rewards his associates to the fullest. He promoted Goodwin to president last week and signed him to a three-year contract as coach, saying, "No one in the world is more qualified for the job than Freddie."

Crocketer was one of the speakers at the seminar staged by the N.A.S.L. at the Plaza. He said that what determined the success of a team most was management. "People-Minded" "Don't tell me this is a soccer city and this one is not," Crocketer said, "One force that determines success is management. Another is your association with the community. You have to do things for people and that's what we have done in Minnesota."

One of the things the Kicks did for their fans was not charge them for parking. And on opening day when the lines got long, free drinks were served while the fans waited to buy tickets. Goodwin, known to New York soccer fans for coaching the old Generals, has turned the Kicks into a marvelous unit. There are no stars. "We don't play as individuals," Goodwin said. "We play as a unit of people together. When we don't have the ball, we chase it, fight for it."

Nets Open In N.B.A. On Coast

The Knicks will open their National Basketball Association season on Oct. 21 at Madison Square Garden, and the Nets, one of the four new teams in the league, will start one day later on the West Coast.

The Knicks' opening opponent will be the Los Angeles Lakers, featuring Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, the N.B.A.'s most valuable player in four of his seven pro seasons.

The Nets' opener will be in Oakland, Calif., against the Golden State Warriors, the team that finished with the best win-loss record in the league last season, but was eliminated in the playoffs by the Phoenix Suns in the Western Conference final.

"I was a running back in college and I feel I can run with the ball with anybody," said the 5-foot-11-inch Rhodes. "The only problem I had last year was on the handoffs, taking them from guys much bigger than me."

Rhodes thinks a lot is within reach this season. "Good things are going to happen to the New York Giants," said the 25-year-old Texan. "With a running attack like this, we may not throw that many passes, but we'll complete more."

The Giants, in fact, completed 60.3 percent of their passes in their first four games. But most of the time, they have gone by land while the primary receivers do secondary jobs—like run pass routes and remember how they got free against certain defensive backs ("I file-cabinet what I did, what moves I made, how the back reacted," said Rhodes, "write it all down") or, wince, block.

John Galbraith, the football coach, would have hired Ted Gonzalez as an assistant even if Gonzalez didn't know the first thing about football. "I would have spent the entire fall teaching him," said the coach of St. Francis Xavier High School in Manhattan. "But Ted is a most knowledgeable football man so that's not the case. I interviewed him for 20 minutes and I felt this coaching opportunity was just too good to pass up. I always wanted the chance to work with high school kids."

Gonzalez rebuilt his body to 210 pounds. Last fall he became a starting defensive tackle on the Fairleigh Dickinson football team. "I never wanted any sympathy from the coaches because of my illness," said Gonzalez, who was born in Cuba and lives in Rutherford. "I became a starter on my own abilities, and it was just a tremendous feeling of satisfaction. It was like the final chapter in my recovery. Then I began to think to myself that maybe my example could be encouragement that cancer is not always a death sentence."

"That's what I tried to tell Ellen Dickinson, a fellow student. Last fall she waited for me by our fieldhouse after a football practice. She has a similar form of cancer, and she was going through all the treatments and therapy."

"Ellen was having trouble walking up steps, and she couldn't understand how I could play football. We talked a great deal during the year and I think I was able to persuade her not to give up. I saw her last week and she has a boyfriend and plans to be a teacher."

Cubs Pin A 5-2 Loss On Braves

CHICAGO, Aug. 28 (AP)—Rick Monday rapped three hits, including his 24th home run, and Jerry Morales knocked in three runs with a single and his 15th homer today, leading Steve Renko and the Chicago Cubs to a 5-2 victory over the Atlanta Braves.

Monday homered in the third, singled home a run in the fifth and scored on Morales's two-run single in the fifth. That hit knocked out the Braves' starter, Dick Ruthven. Morales homered in the eighth off Mike Marshall. Renko, improving his winning record to 6-7, yielded a lost three hits and struck out nine, best for a Cub pitcher this season. He was relieved by Bruce Sutter after seven innings.

Ruthven singled off Renko with two out in the third and Willie Montanez beat out an infield single in the fifth and scored ahead of Ken Henderson's 12th home run. Renko did not allow a hit after that, and struck out five of the next six batters.

Mick Kelleher opened the Chicago fifth with a single, and Renko also singled before Monday stroked a run-scoring single. Jose Cardenal walked, leading the bases before Morales singled, breaking a 2-2 tie.

Japanese Nine Wins Boys Title

WILLIAMSPORT, Pa., Aug. 28 (AP)—Tokyo took advantage of six wild pitches and five errors today and posted a 10-3 victory over Campbell, Calif., in the final game of the Little League world baseball championship.

The Japanese regained the title for the first time since winning consecutive championships in 1967 and 1968 in this tournament for 11 and 12-year-old boys. The victory also returned the crown to the Far East after a one-year lapse in which foreign teams were banned. Taiwan had won five of the previous six titles.

Kiyoshi Tsumura, who had pitched a perfect game in his previous outing, was touched for three hits, including a two-run double by Ed Rodriguez. Tsumura also displayed uncharacteristic wildness by walking four batters and unleashing a pair of wild pitches. He struck out nine.

Campbell's woes began in the second inning with four wild pitches, a passed ball and three errors. The Japanese also had two hits in the inning and scored five runs. Rich Alvarez, the starting pitcher gave up four hits and six walks in 3 2-3 innings. He appeared to be out of trouble after the United States West champions completed a double play with two on and none out. But a walk and battery and fielding errors gave Tokyo its big inning.

Pitt Will Rival Penn State; Maryland, Michigan Bear Watch

East

Joe Paterno has never looked over his shoulder to see who is catching up. His Penn State Nittany Lions have been supreme in the East for eight of his 10 years as their coach. But maybe this time Paterno will see someone catch up and pass him in the East.

Pittsburgh has about everything it needs except depth. There is Tony Dorsett, the only player to enter a senior season with as much as 4,134 yards gained. There is Elliott Walker, who ran for 903 yards as Dorsett's sidekick. There is Al Romano, as good a middle guard as Pitt has ever had. There is a fight for quarterback between two good ones—Bob Haygood and Matt Cavanaugh. And Coach Johnny Majors has created a belief that Pitt can win.

But the Panthers must beat Penn State to earn the top spot. They thought they would do so last year, but fell short despite ample opportunities. Penn State knows how to win every time it plays.

Paterno's backfield is something of a "Who's he?" group, with Larry Suhey, Duane Taylor, Jimmy Cefalo and others back there. John Andrews has the quarterback spot over Chuck Fusina right now. As usual, there are good linebackers.

Harvard is the big favorite to repeat as Ivy League champion. After all, Jim Kubacki is back. There was no more exciting quarterback in the land than this fellow, who was fourth in the nation in total offense (1,701 yards), though he played only eight games.

Navy has lost most of the defense that produced its best season under George Welsh, so the Middies may have to rely on John Kurovski, the running-passing quarterback, to perform very well.

Rutgers will probably have another good season (the team was 9-2 in 1975) and probably not be noticed outside New Jersey. The Scarlet Knights have one of the strongest defensive ends in the nation, Nate Toran.

Syracuse has to prove that Frank Maloney has turned it around for keeps.

Army is not expected to improve much. Little speed has been added to a slow team, although finally the wishbone will be abandoned.

out good players. He has them, and one is Johnny Davis, at fullback.

Florida can challenge Alabama for the conference title; but, as has been the case recently, the two teams don't meet.

Vince Dooley's Georgia team, led by Ray Coofy, quarterback, should do well in the conference while the others pick up from behind.

Georgia Tech, despite some disappointment last year, is about the best of the Southern independents.

South

Maryland could be the king of the region for two big reasons: plenty of talent and an easy schedule. The Terrapins are certainly the best of the Atlantic Coast Conference and have won 15 straight league games.

The Maryland offense is good, with two tried quarterbacks and Steve Atkins, a mere sophomore, as the experienced tailback. Defensively, the Terps are exceptionally rigid up the middle.

Mike Voight is an exceptional runner for North Carolina, in the A.C.C., but it may be Duke and Wake Forest that continue to surprise teams in that league, although none should threaten Maryland for the title.

Alabama is picked to retain its title in the Southeastern Conference even though it has lost Richard Todd and a defensive secondary to graduation. It's impossible to imagine Bear Bryant with-back—Archie Griffin, two-time Heisman Trophy winner—Cornelius Greene, the quarterback, and Brian Boschetto, the wingback. Pete Johnson, the fullback, returns to carry even more than his share. But it should again be a two-team race in the Big Ten. Minnesota is most notable among the other eight.

Michigan State is on probation and starting under a new coach. And its newspaper is accusing Woody Hayes of cheating on recruiting. That seems to be posing as much of a threat to Hayes' right now as the Michigan State team will be for the Buckeyes on the field—apparently very little.

Notre Dame appears to be stronger because of returning players such as Willie Fry, defensive end, and a bunch of running backs. Pittsburgh will offer a good opening test. But Coach Dan Devine's job may be at stake, a situation that always clouds a season for even the best of coaches.

Nebraska tied Oklahoma for the Big Eight title a year ago and is rated the favorite to win that conference crown now. The reason is that the Cornhuskers, having lost Tony Davis, running back, still have most starters back, such as their quarterback, Vince Ferragamo.

Oklahoma, on the other hand, has lost such strength as Leroy and Dewey Selmon on defense and Joe Washington, the running back. The Sooners won't be weak, but they may not be quite so strong.

Southwest

ABC Sports seems confident that Texas and Arkansas will fight for the Southwest Athletic Conference title. The network has got these teams to move their game, originally set for Oct. 16, to the night of Dec. 8 for a nationally televised shootout at Austin, Tex. Rone Arledge, chief of ABC Sports, is just hoping for a repeat of the 1969 Texas-Arkansas television game.

The network could be right. Texas and Arkansas are better-than-average teams. But there are a lot of good teams to be played in this league, before Dec. 4. Texas, even a newcomer, Houston, which finally gets into the Southwest act after years of waiting for acceptance. But Houston is hardly a threat this fall.

Texas A.&M. was the team that tried but just missed winning the title over right in 1975 and had to settle for a three-way tie with Texas and Arkansas. The Aggies aren't quite so strong this year, while Darrell Royal's Longhorns seem powerful enough to win. Earl Campbell, Texas's big runner, may provide a strong Heisman Trophy threat.

Frank Broyles's Arkansas Razorbacks may be forced to go with a freshman quarterback as their offense, which set records last fall, has been thinned out a bit. But most of the good Arkansas defensive unit is returning.

Far West

Coach Frank Kush of Arizona State has said: "Potentially, we do have a fine football team. I think our youngsters are enthused about it."

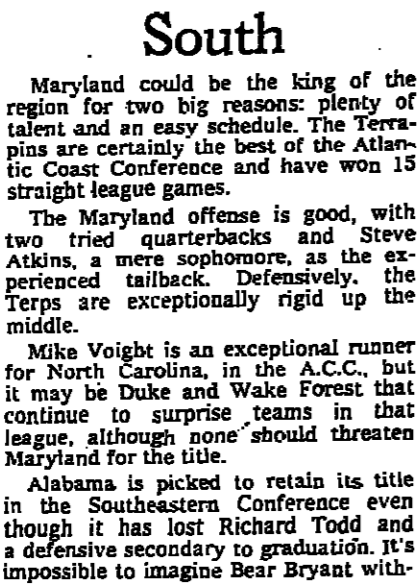

It is expected that the Arizona State team will be considerably more exciting than these words from Kush warrant. In fact, many feel that the Sun Devils could be the best team in the nation. That Arizona State had not had years and years of recognition seemed to prevent it last year from being voted No. 1 in the land after an undefeated and united season that was concluded with an upset over Nebraska Bowl. Beginning his 19th season, Kush has nine offensive. One of these is who won the quarterbacks the season. There are go Sproul.

Arizona State will be Western Athletic Conference there is talk that the Sun day will move from the more prestigious Pacific Southern California and ic-8 teams should be in hasn't taken place yet.

Southern California and a bunch of other players, so the Trojans win the Pacific-8 title at spot against the Big Ten U.S.C. no longer has a coach, who went to the National Football League lost-tied mark of 127-40 as Trojan coach John R placed McKay in a job staying on top.

California, with an ex-back in Joe Roth, may expect challenge to South

Tony Dorsett, an all-American running back from Pitt

The fine line, led by Joe DeLamelleure, will open holes for them and Ferguson, and Gary Marangi, the capable backup, have a crack receiving target in Bob Chandler. But indeed it won't be the same.

New England Patriots

This franchise is in trouble. To acquire 88 percent of the club's voting stock last November the seasoned president, Billy Sullivan, borrowed $5 million from a Chicago bank and reportedly is having difficulty meeting payments.

The collateral is a team that has not had a winning season in a decade; one whose attendance is slipping, and one which traded away its star quarterback, Jim Plunkett, without an established replacement on hand. Steve Grogan, the heir apparent, is trying, but Chuck Fairbanks, coach and general manager, has not been satisfied.

This is Fairbanks' fourth year running the Patriots and he is building well although slowly when speed is required. The two lines are solid but without depth, and two rookies, Mike Haynes and Tim Fox, will start in the defensive backfield.

The top players are Sam Cunningham, the fullback who deserves all-pro consideration. Russ Francis, tight end; Randy Vataha, wide receiver; and Steve Nelson, inside linebacker. Strengths and weaknesses will be determined quickly because the first four games, three at home, are against Baltimore, Miami, Pittsburgh and Oakland.

New York Jets

The difference between the Patriots and the Jets is that the New York team has money in the bank and 60,000 loyal fans, but a football team without an established identity. Lou Holtz, a valuable pick and the new coach, has done what most new coaches do—churn the roster.

Pittsburgh Steelers

The earth may shake at the Bengal-Steeler games on Oct. 17 and Nov. 28.

Everyone keeps reminding the Steelers that they can be the first team to win the Super Bowl game three straight times and Chuck Noll, the coach, retorts in a coachy manner, "We have to win our division first." That may take some doing because outside their tough division the Steelers must play Oakland, Minnesota and Miami.

This appears to be an improved squad if that is possible. The strong center in the N.F.L. as Noll has established such reserves as Steve Furness and John Banaszak in the defensive line; Mary Kileum behind Jack Lambert, the all-pro middle linebacker, plus an impressive rookie running back, Jack Delaplane from Salem College of West Virginia.

None of the veterans retired or went to the World Football League, although Joe Greene's ailments act up more often. Furness replaces him and there's little difference.

The Steelers are not perfect and sometimes play poorly—on the few occasions when Terry Bradshaw emaculates the game plan and throws passes to the wrong places. But that seems to happen less and less.

Houston Oilers

The Oilers finished only one game behind the Bengals and two behind the Steelers last season, drawing attention as they upset Oakland, Miami and Washington. Here was a club on the rise. But this summer Bum Phillips, the easy-going coach, has run into troubles as the team not only lost its exhibitions but looked feeble doing so.

The top running backs, Fred Willis and Ron Coleman, were hurt and seemed unlikely to be ready for opening day. So Phillips last week acquired Albie Taylor from the Lions (subject to a physical exam) and Joe Dawkins from the Giants. It is a sign of weakness when an alleged contender must turn to others to fill out at running back, an easy position to staff.

Phillips hopes his offense will become smooth again with his fine quarterback, Dan Pastorini, finding those fast receivers, Billy Johnson and Ken Burrough. The defense, which gave up only 16 points a game last season, retums and the Oilers seem less likely to get as close to the top.

Cleveland Browns

The Browns last year finished nine games out of first place in their division, which was a feat for a 14-game schedule. Therefore it is easy to say the Cleveland team will be improved this year because it has so far to go following a 3-11 record.

Here are the improvements: Thom Darden returns from knee surgery to play safety. He missed all of last season. The Browns consider themselves fortunate to have traded their second-round draft choice to Oakland for Gerald Irons, a first-class linebacker.

Paul Warfield, 33, is back at wide receiver and almost as good as ever. A rookie, Mike St. Clair, has emerged and may fill that familiar gap at defensive end. Forrest Gregg is more comfortable in his second year as head coach. He has finely established a regular offensive line, his specialty.

Western Division

Oakland Raiders

The Raiders, one of the strongest teams, have the league's easiest schedule. They have only three games against foes with winning records last year: the Steelers, Bengals and Oilers. So Oakland has two seasons, the second beginning on Dec. 18, with the playoffs, starting the road to the Super Bowl. It is a road from which the Raiders have fallen the last four seasons.

There is little new about the silver and black. Concern exists at defensive end because Horace Jones has been lost for the season through knee surgery and Tony Cline has missed some games. Marv Hubbard, the fullback, may not come back from a recurring shoulder injury.

Fred Steinford, the Boston College rookie, replaced 46-year-old George Blanda as kicker. Mike Rae looks like the new No. 2 quarterback behind the steady Ken Stabler. Ted Hendricks is starting at linebacker now and such former talents as Ted Kwalick, Carl Garrett and Bobby Bell are all third string. That tells a lot.

Denver Broncos

The Broncos could have a successful year because their schedule seems so mild. Throw out the two games against the Raiders, plus the ones with Cincinnati and Houston, and Denver could win 10 times. That would depend upon Steve Ramsey having his first good year at quarterback or the newly recruited Otis Armstrong gaining 1,400 yards again, and defensive players like Lyle Alzado at tackle and Randy Gradishar deserving all-pro consideration.

Tom Glassie, the first-draft choice from Virginia, has already made the varsity at guard. Jim Kick is running right behind Jon Keyworth, the big fullback. Bobby Maples, the centers' center, starts his 12th pro season.

San Diego Chargers

There is little to choose among the customary also-rans in this division, the Chargers, Broncos and Chiefs. San Diego last year lost its first 11 games and then rallied to beat the Chiefs and the Jets. The coach, Tom Prothro, saw some good in that and contends he has one of the better young teams in the league.

The addition of Mercury Morris from Miami last week eased the blow when Joe Washington, the wiggly rookie runner from Oklahoma, underwent knee surgery. That was too bad for a 22-year-old touted as another Gale Sayers.

Who plays on this team? There are not many household names. Russ Washington, an offensive tackle who has played in 112 consecutive games, was the only Pro Bowl performer. Charlie Joiner, a former Bengal, and the seasoned Gary Garrison are the wide receivers. Don Woods, who gained 1,142 yards two years ago, is the only proven runner and Dan Fouts is a capable quarterback. The defensive players are even more anonymous.

Kansas City Chiefs

There is a possibility that the Chiefs will open the season with three rookies in the defensive backfield and Paul Wiggin, the coach on the sidelines casting his eyes aloft. Their names? Gary Barbaro, Tim Collier and Steve Taylor, all legitimate middle-round draft choices and not free agents or refugees from the World Football League.

Although records are meager, three rookies in a secondary could be a league record. Wiggin is plodding along trying to rebuild this team with some good older players, such as Willie Lanier, MacArthur Lane, Jim Lynch, Jack Rudnny and Ed Podolak, and newer ones who are not so good.

He must resolve a quarterback situation which finds Tony Adams, late of the W.F.L., pushing hard against Mike Livingston, and declared No. 1. The Chiefs won only five games last year and gave up 341 points, or 179 more than Pittsburgh.

Tampa Bay Buccaneers

John McKay, the slick quipster, is alleged to have told a friend back in Los Angeles that he was leaving Southern California after 15 years as head coach to take charge of the Tampa Bay expansion team because they were going to give him "two big ones." That meant a $2 million contract from Hugh Culverhouse, the rich new owner who is paying $16 million for the franchise.

Using almost exclusively players obtained from the other 26 teams by trade or in the expansion draft, McKay has built a respectable team. Steve Spurrier, the seasoned quarterback from San Francisco, has done especially well in leading the offense.

Essex Johnson from the Bengals and Vince Kendrick from the Falcons are the running backs. The first-draft choice, the heralded Leroy Selmon from Oklahoma, has been hurt and is behind Council Rudolph at defensive end. The Buccaneers drew a full house of 71,000 to their first home game, and it appears that the team, the fans and the coach, McKay, are going to have a lot of fun this year.

Lavender in the defensive backfield; Ron Saul at guard, a problem position; John Riggins and Calvin Hill at running back although Hill now is behind Mike Thomas; Jean Fugett at tight end, and either John Matuszak or Dave Butz on the defensive line.

New York Giants

The Giants have dropped the "NY" from their helmet decal and it now says "Giants" in keeping with the team's move to the Hackensack Meadows of New Jersey. The Mara family will make a great deal of money in East Rutherford immediately but success on the field may take longer.

Although the team is certainly improved and its personnel stabilized in Bill Arnsparger's third year as coach, results will not show because the schedule is the most difficult in the National Football League. The Giants must play seven of their 14 games against teams that were in the playoffs last December.

The Giants have beaten their chief division rivals—the Cardinals, Cowboys and Redskins—only twice in the last 18 games, since 1973. The place to start out differently is in the opening game at Washington on Sept. 12. "We're pointing for that one," says Karl Chandler, the center-guard from Princeton.

Philadelphia Eagles

The Eagles have the best fans in pro football. The club has led the league the last three seasons in selling season tickets ($4,000), but there has not been a winning Eagle team in 10 years.

This season marks another new start under another new coach, Dick Vermeil, hired at great cost by a new general manager, Jim Murray. Vermeil already is discouraged and complains he could not bid for available talent like John Zook because the previous coach, Mike

Central Division

McCormack, had traded away all the high draft choices. Manny Sistrunk from the Redskins can help a weak defensive line. Ed George from the Colts can do the same for the weak offensive line. Mike Boryla leaves something to be desired as the quarterback. Tom Sullivan and Art Malone strive hard at running back. The leading rookie appears to be a 30-year-old wide receiver from the World Football League named Vince Papale.

Minnesota Vikings

Bud Grant, like Don Shula and Tom Landry, has the knack of replacing the worn out parts of his team and continuing to win. Of course it helps that the Vikings are seldom challenged within their division.

Detroit was supposed to challenge this year, but the Lions have had a chaotic training camp; the Packers are pitiful, and the Bears were eight back last season.

Minnesota will replace John Gilliam, who left for Atlanta, with Sammy White, a rookie from Grambling. The Vikings are always finding good new receivers but they stay with the same old quarterback, Fran Tarkenton, who will erase all remaining N.F.L. passing records this season, his 18th.

Jim Lash returns as the other receiver and Chuck Foreman and Brent McLanahan will be the running backs again.

Other familiar faces on this truly professional team are Mick Tingelhoff, Ed White and Ron Vary on the offensive line; Carl Eller, Jim Marshall, Alan Page, Roy Winston, Wally Hilgenberg and Paul Krause on the defensive unit. They have played a total of 99 seasons with the Vikings, an "Over The Hill Gang" still going up the hill.

Detroit Lions

Herb Orvis, a 29-year-old tackle and the best defensive lineman on a team which has so few, was suspended last week for "talking back" to the coach, Rick Forzano, at a team meeting. Albie Taylor, the best running back, was traded to Houston after contract troubles with the general manager, Russ Thomas.

Once Forzano had named Joe Reed the No. 1 quarterback over Greg Landry and Bill Munson, the 35-year-old Munson, No. 1 last year, demanded to be traded. Steve Owens, a one-time Pro Bowl fullback, chose premature retirement because of a bad knee.

So the Lions, who are expected to roar this season, are sputtering. This is a spotty team, with the defense good at linebacker and in the secondary but not up front. The offense has Dexter Bussey and a rookie, Lawrence Gaines, as its unproven running backs. There seem to be one and a half receivers and about two-thirds of an offensive line.

Chicago Bears

The Bears under Jack Pardee, the coach appointed last year, and Jim Finks, the general manager who took over in 1974, have replaced their regulars at 18 positions, and only 16 Bears from the past-place team of two years ago remain.

Fran Tarkenton of the Vikings with trophy as 1975's top pro quarterback

The new quarterback established late last season is Bob Avellini from Maryland and everybody likes him as a passer, strategist and leader. It goes on from there with six other second-year pros running the offense.

The team has been winning, too, with enthusiasm and no empty seats in Soldier Field for a change. The only trouble is that the Bears are babies and they have not beaten any of the good teams. Nor will they for awhile.

Green Bay Packers

The Packers had only one Pro Bowl candidate last season, Fred Carr, the linebacker whom Vince Lombardi picked as a first draft choice in 1968. Since that time the Packers have fallen far behind the pace.

Bart Starr, who knows a good quarterback when he sees one, traded for a new one last spring, Lynn Dickey of Houston. But torn rib muscles have held Dickey back this summer, and the Green Bay offense is far behind. It may never catch up.

Gale Gillingham, another Lombardi-era alum, is back to play guard after a year out of football. Steve Odum and Ken Payne seem to be adequate receivers and John Brockington has had his good days, but not lately, at running back.

The good guys on defense are Carr, Jim Carter, the linebacker out with a busted hand, and Willie Buchanon, the cornerback. But there are not enough of them.

Western Division

Los Angeles Rams

There is no divisional competition in sight here because the Rams are so safety, John Hill at center, and Don Hermann at wide receiver.

San Francisco 49ers

The 49ers also have a new coach in Monte Clark, a new quarterback in Jim Plunkett, and they are hoping for a lot of new season-ticket purchasers. Plunkett is a hometown boy who starred at Stanford and became a Rose Bowl hero. Such has been the demise of pro football in Candlestick Park that the selling of a local hero is being revived.

Clark was Don Shula's line coach at Miami and he believes in the run-run fundamentals. So 49er fans cannot expect any razzle-dazzle of the Frankie Albert or Y. A. Tittle style out of Plunkett. So far big Jim has had a poor summer, but no one allegedly is worrying.

The 49ers have been winning their exhibition games although not impressively, and the team's problems loom large. They are in both lines, primarily. Which one is the team's best player? It is hard to say because not a single 49er was voted to the Pro Bowl last season.

Atlanta Falcons

The best Falcon players are Jeff Van Note, the center; Steve Bartkowski, the quarterback who was the N.F.C. rookie of the year last season; and Claude Humphrey, the defensive end who spent the 1975 campaign recovering from knee surgery. The Falcons missed him.

The team's offense sizzled under Bartkowski in the last four games and Humphrey is back this season. But something has gone wrong because the Falcons have played poorly in the preseason games. The owner, Rankin Smith, gave the coach, Marion Campbell, a vote of confidence although Smith has not been noted for his patience.

Pat Peppier, the general manager guiding the team's destiny, is going for the long haul with rookies and draft choices. Two rookies are starting at tackle and Zook was traded for St. Louis's first draft choice. "I couldn't turn that down," said Peppier.

Seattle Seahawks

The Seahawks are in addition to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. Like the Buccaneers their schedule calls for them to play every other team in their conference and conveniently lose to each. But this may not happen. The Seahawks have built their initial team on defense and it has held up quite well in the preseason games.

Steve Niehaus, the first draft choice, is starting at defensive tackle and Mike Curtis, the former Colt chosen first in the expansion draft, now plays at outside linebacker.

Jim Zorn, a W.F.L. alum, and Neil Craft, a former Patriot, have been the quarterbacks. Jack Peters, the coach, says he will stick with them. "They may not be ticketed for the Pro Bowl but we're not in as bad shape as people thought."

All the games in the 65,000-seat Kingdome Stadium will be sold out as pro football comes to the last region of the nation it has never touched before.

There's so much going on, there's only one sure way to keep up with all of it.

Wood, Field and Stream Yields Emotion, Not Satisfaction

By NELSON BRYANT Special to The New York Times MATAPEDIA, Quebec—Although my hands were steady, there was an inner fluttering as I cast my first fly across the roly waters of the Patapédia Pool on the Ristigouche River.

It was not unlike the emotion I felt when as an undergraduate in college I was asked, with another, to spend a day escorting the members of the Ristigouche Salmon Club.

For a little while the skies lightened, then the day turned dark and rain fell torrents. I cast for more than an hour before a fish took, and I lifted the rod hoping to feel the weight of a big salmon, but alas, it was only a merrill, or young salmon, and it was also my only fish of the day.

nal Leg in Ocean Series Starts Friday

DAVID FISHERMAN of Long Island Sound sailing — those endless combinations of winds, tides and weather changes.

"It is sailing by perceptive knowledge of weather conditions. An easterly wind will shift north or south. The key is knowing what shore to go to," says Kent Straat, race committee chairman.

"Some say the Connecticut shore is favored, others take the Long Island shore. But the decision depends on the tide and how you're doing."

The key areas are the Race along the Connecticut shore and Plum Gut off Long Island, where a six-knot current can build up.

"There are so many reflections to consider as the wind bounces off Long Island and you can catch the current swirling along the points of the Long Island shore, sometimes you can get a favorable two-knot current. In half an hour, this alone would give you a mile lead over boats in the center of the Sound," explains Straat.

A new trophy has been added this year in memory of John B. Gillespie, who had been active in the club's junior sailing programs. It will be awarded to the fastest yacht, which is less than 39 feet over all, on corrected time.

A sailing team from Scotland, representing the Royal Northern Yacht Club, will race the Seawanhaka-Corinthian Yacht Club for the British-America Cup off Oyster Bay, L. I., beginning on Tuesday. This will be team racing in Soling class sloops, four boats on a side, for one of the oldest international trophies in yachting.

The prize will go to the first team to win four races and the following week Buddy Melges from Lake Zurich, Wis., will defend another old trophy, the Seawanhaka Cup, against one of the Scottish skippers. These trophies were formerly raced for in 5.5-Meter and 6-Meter sloops.

Neither wind, nor waves, nor a half-swamped boat deterred Joel Halpern from his appointed rounds. The Bronxville real estate developer drove Beep Beep, his offshore powerboat, across the English Channel to win the Needles Trophy race last weekend.

Halpern, who roared into the offshore racing circuit this year in his new 38-foot Cobra (he bought the company formerly owned last year), credits his driving mechanic, Wayne Vickers, with saving the race. "The cockpit was half full of water and Wayne fell down into it. But as he fell, he thrust the throttle forward and we came out of the trough," said Halpern, who is going full-speed ahead for the national and world titles. The victory moved him to second place in world point standing, behind Tom Gentry of Hawaii. In national point standing, Halpern was leading Preston Helm of Pompano Beach, Fla., with two races left to the season, which ends Sept. 18 with the San Francisco race.

In other powerboat news, Hugh Alessandrini in his 36-foot Chris Craft Annina won the Atlantic Highlands, N.J., Yacht Club predicted log contest last weekend, scoring a 2.6663 percentage of error over the 25 1/4-mile course in lower New York Bay. His Shrewsbury power quadron team, Doug Barnes, placed second followed by Mel Stryker of A.H.Y.C.

In the wake of the 1976 model year, which ends Wednesday, the boating industry appears bullish on the prospects for 1977.

The latest market statistics showed June boat and accessory sales dollar value up 25 percent over last year. Part of the increase is attributed to the entry of new boatmen into the market. Small sailboats, inboard and outboard powerboats, were the big gainers in 1976, according to the National Association of Engine and Boat Manufacturers, a trade group based in New York.

Frank Scalapino, N.A.E.B.M. vice president, said 1976 looks as if it will be the industry's second best year in unit sales and he predicted record highs in unit and dollar volumes for the coming year.

A purse of $10,000 will be at stake with a first prize of $4,000 and a trophy.

Nets vs. Knicks in 3 Exhibitions

The New York Nets have announced a preseason schedule of eight games against National Basketball Association rivals, three against the New York Knicks. The Nets and Knicks will meet Sept. 30 at Nassau Coliseum, Oct. 7 at Madison Square Garden and Oct. 12 at New Haven. 85 Entered in Battery Yacht Race

A record entry of 85 yachts was announced yesterday for the third annual Battery Park City Government's Cup race Sept. 11. The race is open to cruising yachts with on-deck measurement of at least 24 feet. The largest entry is the 62-foot trimaran Spirit of America, which will race in a new division for multihulled craft.

EVEREST CLEAN-UP

A student "clean-up trek" to the base of Mount Everest in Nepal is being planned for Feb. 18-March 21 next year by Mountain Travel Inc., 1398 Solano Avenue, Albany, Calif. 94706. The trip is one of eight treks the agency has projected for the first half of next year to Nepal, the home of eight of the world's 10 highest mountains. The clean-up trek, Mountain Travel says, is being offered below cost to students and others under 35 "who are strong, energetic and willing to make a contribution to the preservation of Nepal's delicate mountain environment."

"The increase in the number of trekkers in the Himalayas, combined with the increasing number of major expeditions on Mount Everest," according to Mountain Travel, "has created an unfortunate problem: trash and litter in Shangri-La."

Two clean-up efforts were undertaken at Everest this year—one by Mountain Travel and the other by Evergreen College in Olympia, Wash. The trek next February, according to the company, will be "a real working trek, with fewer Sherpas and porters, and the participants will be expected to carry their own gear and engage in a variety of tasks from picking up accumulated litter to digging disposal sites for debris."

Says a spokesman for Mountain Travel: "We hope by offering this kind of trek to focus attention on the need for all trekkers and climbers not to abuse the sanctity of mountain environments." The inclusive cost, including round-trip air fare between New York and Kathmandu, is $1,691.

If you prefer a more leisurely Himalayan adventure, with Sherpas taking everything but your camera, contact Hanns Ebensten Travel (55 West 42d Street, New York 10036). The Ebensten treks include a journey on elephants into the Nepalese jungle of Terai and a canoe trip down the Rapti River. The dates are Nov. 7 to Dec. 1 and Feb. 13 to March 9. The price: $3,350 per person, all-inclusive from New York.

MISSISSIPPI PLANTATION

The Floewood River Plantation, a new "living history" park that has opened in Greenwood, Miss., is designed to illustrate the lifestyle of an 1850's Southern plantation. Mule-drawn wagons haul tourists through the cotton fields, and in 21 buildings crafts are practiced as they were in pre-Civil War days. In addition, there are spacious landscaped grounds, an orchard, a formal garden, and an herb garden. Floewood is accessible from Interstate 55, two miles southwest of Greenwood. It is administered by the Mississippi Park Commission and the admission charge is $2 for adults, $1 for children (free for those under 6).

NEVADA STATE FAIR

The Nevada State Fair will be held in Reno from Sept. 8 to 12. One of its highlights will be the National Championship Air Races, with the nation's hottest pilots competing for $100,000 in prizes. There will also be a fireworks display, a mini-circus, motorcycle races and stage shows.

BICYCLE TRAIL

An 800-mile bicycle trail from Boston, Mass., to Richmond, Va., has been mapped out by the East Coast Bicycle Congress, a coalition of cycling groups that includes the League of American Wheelmen and American Youth Hostels. Called the East Coast Bicycle Trail, it is, according to its sponsors, the Appalachian Trail of cycling and will be maintained by L.A.W. and A.Y.H. members. A trail guidebook consisting of a large index map, general information on bicycle touring and 20 strip maps is available for $4.95

Letters: Free Classes In Boating Offered

To the Editor:

In regard to the article by Milton Viorst, "Canoeing Boom: A Family Joins the White-Water Brigade" (Travel Section, Aug. 8), permit me to point out some of the specific unsafe practices in which he and his family engaged and to tell them how to avoid them in the future. Opportunities abound at practically no cost to enable the public to handle canoes and other small craft safely and to school them in rescue techniques besides.

The major error the Viorsts made was to embark in a single canoe loaded with four people and their camping gear. Had they been in two canoes, they doubtless would have floated over many of the obstacles over which they dragged their boat. With the minimum freeboard they had, it's indeed fortunate their trip was no more hazardous than it was. One shudders to think what might have befallen them had the trip been in the spring or after a heavy rain when the river was swollen and flowing swiftly.

Had they taken a minimum course of instruction, their maneuvering around "rocks and shoals" could have been easy and natural, and they could have known how to empty the swamped canoe with, in effect, a flip of the wrist, rather than the tedious bailing they resorted to.

The general public can learn, at no cost, not only safe canoeing, but sailing, outboard boating and rowing through local American Red Cross Chapter safety programs. Furthermore, the courses are conducted in real boats on the water.

In the metropolitan area courses will be conducted at Red Cross small-craft schools during the weekend of Sept. 3-6. These include basic canoeing and sailing as well as first-aid and cardio-pulmonary resuscitation. Information and applications for these and other courses scheduled throughout the year can be obtained from Safety Programs, American Red Cross, 150 Amsterdam Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10023 (212-787-1000, Ext. 485). For courses outside the metropolitan area, local Red Cross chapters should be contacted.

To the Editor:

Closer at hand than some of the trips mentioned in the white-water canoeing article are those out of Harper's Ferry, W. Va. The trips run for four hours, cost $12.50 per hour, with safety equipment provided and competent guides. They are operated by River and Trail Outfitters, Box 246, Valley Road, Knoxville, Md. 21758.

NIAGARA FALLS

To the Editor: As coincidence would have it, the day I returned from a trip that included a couple of days in the Niagara Falls area, I read "What's Doing in Niagara Falls" (Travel Section, Aug. 15).

It was an informative piece, but there was no mention of Fort Niagara (where the Niagara River meets Lake Ontario) or of Fort George, its counterpart on the Canadian side. These forts played an important part in American history and are, next to the falls themselves, the best attractions in the area.

One could easily spend half a day or more at Fort Niagara, memorable not only for the history made there, but for its lovely setting and the attractive state park surrounding it.

SHAWNEE

To the Editor:

On the way home from the Shawnee Inn and Village, where my husband and I and six friends had just enjoyed an incredible "mini-vacation," I discovered Ralph Blumenthal's account of his experiences at Shawnee in "Something for Nothing" (Travel Section, Aug. 15). Well, Mr. Blumenthal might just as well have been in our little party—our "vacations" were almost identical.

The Shawnee deal must be the best vacation bargain anywhere: a pleasant room, two good meals, gorgeous grounds, terrific facilities, dancing and entertainment, all for $19.95 per pearing. It turned out, of course, that a lot of our visitors are over 60—to them it's nostalgia, because they remember their parents' and grandparents' homes and farms. I figured people would relate better to the 19th century than to the 18th."

In more than a dozen buildings and sheds, spread over seven acres in sort of a lopsided figure-eight, King has amassed an incredible stockpile of 19th-century artifacts, all purchased—and many made—within 100 miles of Newfield. The place looks as though a rich man went wild in every antique store he could find—as it happens, of course, that's not far from the truth. Except that King also scoured the area for direct purchases.

Yankee thrift turned out to be his greatest ally. "No one in Maine ever threw anything out," he says. "I just bought a trunk made in 1840. The people were still using it. They had to empty the clothes out to give it to me."

For its first several years, Willowbrook was called a museum. Lately, King has decided that the word is off-putting and has had the signs changed to read "village" instead. Actually, the place is a little of both. It's a collection of furnished houses, barns and sheds, some on their original sites, in the form of a 19th-century village. Yet, while parts of Willowbrook are maintained as though life in the last century were still going on there, others simply contain museum displays: shelves of period artifacts and implements in neat rows.

Unlike most museums, which proudly display antiques in their natural state of disrepair in the name of authenticity, here everything is restored to its condition at the day of manufacture. Willowbrook, as a result, looks as if some forward-looking 19th-century curator had set up a museum of contemporary life and it had come down to us intact.

There is no rust, no dirt. Upholstery —be it red velvet or flower print—is freshly done. Wallpaper is cleaned or duplicated in the old style. Missing nails are replaced, splinters sanded smooth. The carriages—there are dozens of them—are all stripped and freshly painted in their original bright colors. "All the restoration and operation," King says, "is done by our women—or, as I call them, ladies. We have a male groundskeeper and one male resident artist, but the rest of the staff—between 10 and 20, depending on the season—are m.e.s. Their quality of workmanship is better and they have better dispositions in handling people. Even the house painting is done by ladies."

During the school year, King makes sure that his "ladies" see their children off to school in the morning and get home before the kids return in the afternoon. "It's very important," he insists. Every morning at precisely 10 A.M., opening time, a drum roll sounds loudly over a public address system, signaling King and the staff to stop in their tracks and stand at attention while Old Glory is raised to the top of the flagpole, as a recording of "The Star Spangled Banner" cuts through the country quiet.

Georgia Perry is director of Willowbrook, although, of course, King makes the top-level decisions. His anonymity—the staff wears little badges, he doesn't—is a longstanding quirk. He never made himself president of the grease company he founded, being satisfied as executive vice president because, as he puts it, "I never want to be where they can shoot at me." At Willowbrook, he likes to stay out of the limelight for two reasons: to keep clear of people asking him for money and to keep away from people offering to donate items. "I accept no contributions," he says. "Some dams will come in with a broken-down chair and want you to display it where she wants you to. It's no good. This way we have the latitude to do what we want."

Willowbrook was named for willow trees that once grew by the brook that runs through the area, feeding out of a walled oval pond. A superbly rustic old mill nearby, now a private residence, is the only structure in the immediate area that isn't part of King's village.

In its heyday, the 1870's, the Newfield region boomed with small industry. The largest carriage and sleigh maker in the state was here. There were, according to one count, 13 blacksmiths, seven harness makers, 17 cabinet makers and 42 shoemakers in the area. The boom died as Western carriage builders took over the market and Newfield's tradespeople began to move away. In 1947, most of the town burned. A few of the museum-village's structures are survivors. Other buildings the visitor sees were moved from different sites; still others are replicas.

Ticket purchasers are directed first to the William Durgin barns, a pair of neat, white-painted buildings that go with the old Durgin house opposite. One barn houses a crowded country store selling things like penny candy, maple sugar and kitchen implements. The odor of pickles from a wood barrel fills the store. Amos Straw opened his store here in 1832, although the barn then stood 30 feet nearer the road; it was moved in 1890.

In the rear barn is a variety of craft displays, each of astounding depth. The cabinet shop holds dozens of compasses, augers and glue pots, and possibly 50 planes. The shoe shop has rows of pointed-toe high boots and shoes for men, women and children; the laundry, a collection of washboards and early person-powered washing machines; the creamery, various cheese presses and butter churns. A giant loom dominates the weaving room. The smith shop has scores of hinges and horseshoes.

Upstairs, some 20 carriages and sleighs line the loft—everything from

Why Sea Pines suggests you take your summer vacation this fall.

Fall is like summer at Sea Pines. Except that some things are even better. Like the weather.

The better weather. If you haven't already taken your summer vacation, you were smart. Wait until you see the weather that Sea Pines has waiting for you in the fall. The air is sweet. There's hardly a cloud of all levels. So you can return home with a nice backhand as well as a tan.

The golf is never better.

Some of the finest golf in the world is at Sea Pines. One of our four courses is the famous Harbour Town Golf Links, where they play the Heritage Classic each year. The courses never look better, never play better than they do in the fall.

or a great blue heron. Or perhaps a wobbly-legged fawn. There are 11 miles of bike trails at Sea Pines. It's the best way to see the plantation. You don't whiz by things. And it's great exercise.

The prices are perfect. Sea Pines can cost you as little as $26 a day or as much as $44 a day, per person, double occupancy, depending on where you stay.

Where you stay.

Villas. The Sea Pines Villas are beautifully designed town houses and apartments overlooking either the fairways, forests, harbors or lagoons of the island. Each is completely furnished by its owners for their use as well as yours.

in the sky. And the sun is warm; the average midday temperature in October is 73°.

The beach is better.

The summer people have gone home. Look down our 4½ miles of beach and see more pelicans than human beings. Poke a toe into the ocean and get a surprise: it's even warmer than the air. (Hilton Head Island is in South Carolina, remember.)

Greens fees for most courses are $12. Golf carts are required for starts before 2 o'clock.

The creeks at Sea Pines teem with speckled trout and spottail bass in the fall.

Lunker bass prowl in the surf, and kingfish and red snapper lurk offshore. And, out to sea in the Gulf Stream, there is the heart-pounding challenge of sailfish and marlin and dolphin. We have all the equipment you'll need. And the canniest of guides.

Take a fishing cruise, 13 miles out on the "Gypsy." It's $12 a person for five hours, including bait and tackle.

Take a walk in the 572-acre Sea Pines Forest Preserve. The paths have interpretive signs to help you understand what you are looking at. Bring your camera. You may see an egret

What's Doing in the THAMES VALLEY

By IAN LYON

ESCAPE ROUTE—The Great street paved with water? was how the poet John Massfield described the River Thames. For Londoners it represents escape from city pressures; for visitors it is a leisurely route out of the capital and into the countryside. The "great street" rises in the Cotswolds. Toward its source are lovely meadows near Lechlade; from there to Oxford, as the river winds past occasional villages, are lovely willows, isolated houses. For superb scenery, the best stretch is Maidenhead to Marlow. For villages and old market towns, heading to Oxford. And near the center of London is the splendid Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew.

GETTING AROUND—If you've time to spare, take a boat. A round trip from Westminster, in the heart of London, costs $1.80; one to Hampton Court about $3.75. The Kew trip takes an hour and a half each way, the Hampton Court trip four to five hours. Check departure times in London by calling 930-2074. Boats also operate between Windsor, Bray, Cookham and Marlow; Henley, Sonning and Reading; Oxford and Abingdon. A typical price is $3.15 charged for the Windsor-Marlow round trip. Reservations: Windsor, 658-32; Oxford, 43421; Reading, 52388. Houseboats can be rented from about $65 to $435 a week from Boat Encounters, Walton Well Road, Oxford (Oxford 51161), which also offers three-day river cruises starting at $55 or so a person. British Rail in London (262-6767) will provide information on trains to Thames Valley towns and on rail river day trips. Among operators of motorcoach tours are London Transport (222-1234) and American Express (930-4411).

KEW GARDENS—Kew is the ultimate expression of the English spirit for beautiful gardens. The 288-acre Royal Botanic Gardens—Kew Gardens' official name—is a treasure trove of plants from all over, a complex of peaceful parkland and ornamental flowers with a royal palace to explore. For two centuries Kew has been a training center for gardeners. Its plants have been exported to create big industries: quinine in India, coffee and bananas to countries without them. There are masses of bamboos and Caribbean palms, the Sacred Lotus and the Egyptian papyrus, junipers, redwoods, and other, deadly nightshade, Venus fly-trap and love-lies-bleeding. Summer highlights include the rose garden by the Palm House, agave flowering in the Succulent House, tropical waterlilies, the bedding along the Broad Walk. The quietest part of the gardens is usually along Syon Vista, a broad avenue bordered by the lake. There are warning notices: "Peasants should not be given to the waterfowl as they are too large for them to digest and may prove fatal." Admission: 1 penny (2 cents for children). Devotees can spend a whole day: There are three-course lunches at $2.25 featuring such dull cafeteria flora as boiled sprouts, canned fruit salad for dessert. The gardens are open 10 A.M. to 8 P.M. (11 A.M. in winter). Most of the plant houses are open 11 A.M. to 4 P.M. The official guide costs 45 cents. Bus routes from London: 27, 65 and, on Sundays, 15. Nearest subway station: Kew Gardens. From the Regulations: "No profane language. No person shall smoke in the Plant Houses. No person shall bring in any plant." Kew has 25,000 different kinds already.

Kew Palace—This building in Kew Gardens is the smallest of Britain's royal palaces and was the home of George III and Queen Charlotte in the early 19th century. It is only 70 feet long and 30 feet wide and is decorated with family heirlooms and royal regalia. There are alphabetical counters used by George's children (Apples, Bee, Cow . . . Xerxes, Yew, Zebra), lockets with the King's profile, his fishing tackle and dressing table, a princess's fans and a conque or nobly fall. The palace dates from 1631 and its gardens reflect an era when plants were not for beauty but for cooking or medicine—to mask the flavor of tainted, but still, relieve convulsions. There are fish "for serpent bites," dog's tooth violet for worms. The lawn is chamomile—a low dense growth, so no mowing was needed, very fragrant if you pass over it. But it tends to rot in winter. The palace is open through the end of September, 11 A.M. to 5:30 P.M., Sundays.

HAMPTON COURT—Cardinal Wolsey's income in the 16th century was £100,000 a year, so he was able to build the grandest private house in the kingdom—which Henry VIII took over and embellished as a royal palace. Wolsey, a butcher's son, put a household of 500 in it, with 280 rooms for guests. This Grand Hotel of Tudor England takes at least a morning or an afternoon to tour. Highlights: astronomical clock (1540), with the moon's phases, the date, hour and zodiac signs. Astrology enthusiasts can check out their prospects; practical travelers can work out the time of high water at London Bridge. Also intriguing are the state apartments, with 3,000 pieces of arms arranged by a royal gunsmith, 500 tapestries (Titian, a Duccio triptych, Holbein, the 17th-century Dutch school and others). The formal gardens stretch for nearly half a mile to the river. They include the Maze, which you share on fine days with 200 screaming visitors all determined to get lost; the Great Vine, planted in 1769, over 100 feet long, still producing Black Hamburgh grapes; Henry's tennis court, and benches where the exhausted and footsore eat picnic lunches. Admission: 50 cents. Open weekdays 9:30 A.M. to 5 P.M., Sundays, 11-6 P.M. Lecture tours at 11 and 2:15 Monday through Saturday, to the end of September. The guidebook costs 45 cents; the garden guide, 75 cents. Sunday services in the Chapel Royal are at 11 and 3:30.

ROYAL WINDSOR—Windsor, 22 miles from London, has narrow cobbled streets behind an elegant 17th-century Guildhall. The colors of its central buildings are carefully controlled. The main attraction is Windsor Castle, its state apartments and park. The castle is nine centuries old, the only royal residence in continuous use since the early Middle Ages. Over 1.5 million visitors wander around Windsor each year, and "wander" is the key word. There is so much to see and so many with nearly 5,000 acres of parkland, forest and monuments, is a good place to roam when the traffic jams in Windsor's narrow streets become insupportable. You can drive to one of the entrances—Virginia Water, Bishopsgate, Rangers Gate or Park Street Gate—and then walk for miles. For example, it's three miles from Park Street Gate to Snow Hill where there's a superb view of the castle and park. When you are tired of historic landmarks, there are elephants, giraffes, zebras, lions and dolphins in the Safari Park, a little more than a mile south of Windsor; admission is 90 cents a person or $3.60 for a car and all its occupants. Farther along, on a meadow three miles away, King John was forced to sign a document in 1215 that said, "No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or in any way ruined, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." The document was Magna Carta. Today on this spot at Runnymede there is a pillar of English granite erected by the American Bar Association to commemorate Magna Carta, symbol of freedom under law. Nearby is the John F. Kennedy Memorial, English ground given to the United States by Britain. Other famous men are linked with the area. The poet Milton's cottage is at Chalfont St. Giles, north of Windsor (open Monday to Saturday 10 A.M. to 1 P.M., 2:15 to 6 P.M., and Sundays, 2:15-6:15). One mile distant, William Penn, founder of Pennsylvania, was buried in the village of Jordans. The Quaker Meeting House there is open Wednesdays through Sundays; wood from the "Mayflower" is said to have been used in the building of the barn nearby.

FESTIVAL TIME—One of the best periods to enjoy Windsor castle and nearby Eton is during the Windsor Festival, which this year runs from Sept. 18 to Oct. 2. In the castle's Waterloo Chamber, the English Chamber Orchestra will present Haydn and Mozart at 8 P.M. on Sept. 24 (tickets, about $5.85 to $8), and in St. George's Chapel Bach's Christmas Oratorio will be performed at 7 crowds that a visit can get very confusing. To avoid weekends and bad temper, avoid weekends and get a basic guidebook and read it before entering the state apartments. Recommended are "Discovering Windsor," 45 cents, which covers history, walks, villages nearby; "Windsor" by Shelagh Bond, 90 cents, including pretty photographs of the town, and "Windsor Castle," 25 cents, the official guide, which includes a leaflet listing the works of art currently displayed in the apartments. The apartments should not be a minor part of a 30-minute tour; allow at least an hour and a half to gaze at room after room, chamber after hall of relentless opulence, continuing monarchy, awestruck visitors. Priceless paintings abound, especially in the King's Dressing Room. Admission to the apartments is 45 cents; they are open 10:30 A.M. to 5 P.M., Sundays, 1:30-5. A tape-recorded tour guide is 45 cents extra. To escape the hordes, add a tour for 20 cents, to the exhibition of drawings: Leonardo, Holbein, Michelangelo, Raphael, etc. Fine framed reproductions of them for $7-$18 are probably the best mementos you can get from the Thames Valley. Another way out of the crowds is to join Evening at 5 P.M. in St. George's Chapel. The chapel postpones the notion that "the meek shall inherit the earth," for here are the proud banners of knights, the ornamented tombs of kings, bright badges of heraldry, monarchs and princes set high in the stained glass. Another option is to walk to Church Street, where there is a 1645 tea-shop, "Prudy House," serving afternoon tea for around $1.80. At 50 Thames Street the hamburgers are $1-$1.80.

OUTSIDE THE CASTLE—The Changing of the Guard is at 10:25 A.M. daily in the castle precincts. The Household Cavalry (the Life Guards and the Royal Horse Guards) has a museum at Comber Barracks, St. Leonard's Road; open Monday to Friday, 10 A.M. to 1 P.M. and 2-5 P.M. Not all the time need be spent indoors. Windsor Great Park,

P.M. on Sept. 25 ($2.25-$6.30). The Amadeus String Quartet plays Haydn's Op. 51 in the castle at 8 P.M. Sept. 27 ($5.40-$7.20). Then cellist Paul Tortelier performs the Elgar cello concerto at 8 P.M. on Sept. 28 ($7.20-$9). On Sept. 30 George Malcolm conducts the English Chamber Orchestra (Bach and Mozart) in the Waterloo Chamber ($5.85-$8). On each Saturday afternoon during the festival, there are organized walks through Eton College, including parts not normally open to the public, and a guided walk of Eton in Victorian Windsor. Each starts at 2:30 P.M. and costs $1.35. For jazz, there is Humphrey Hightower and his Band in Wraybury and Maidenhead on Sept. 20 and 22, with seats at $2.50. For more reservations, call Windsor 51696.

STATELY HOMES—Sex scandals, ghosts, Tudor grandeur, Rembrandts, precious porcelain and students from Stanford University are linked with great houses in the Thames Valley. The American students are tenants in the Astor family's elegant Cliveden, near Maidenhead, which had swinging weekend parties for society notable in the 1920s. One of the girls was very sociable with a British Government Minister—and a Soviet attaché. Visitors pay $1.25 to troop past splendid tapestries and Louis XV furniture, to explore the baroque and terraces that tower over the Thames; the perfect setting for the haughty optimism of "Rule, Britannia!," first sung here in 1739. The gardens (admission $1) are open daily from 11 A.M. to 6 P.M. except on Monday and Tuesday. The mansion is open from 2:30 to 5:30 P.M. on Wednesdays and weekends, and admission is 20 cents. Cliveden closes at the end of October. For a haunted and creepy, Cromwellian armor and antique oak furniture, visit Littlecote House in Hungerford. It's open on weekends 2-6 P.M.; $1. Elizabethan staircases and moldered ceilings are found at Mapledurham House, four miles from Reading off the A497 road. Open weekends to Sept. 26, 2:30-5:30 P.M.; 90 cents. It can also be reached by boat from Caversham Bridge in Reading; fare, $2.25. Phone: Reading 470628. There are Rembrandts and Italianate water gardens at Buscot House on the A417 between Lechlade and Faringdon, an 18th-century house in the Adam style set amid 55 acres of park and lake. Open Wednesdays 2-6 P.M.; $1. Fine porcelain: Milton Manor, in Milton, 14 miles south of Abingdon. It has stained glass from the 14th and 16th centuries in its private chapel. Weekends till Oct. 10, 2-6 P.M.; 75 cents.

FOR ART'S SAKE—"In all probability the most important picture painted by an English artist during the present century," said The Times of London of "Resurrection" by Stanley Spencer (1891-1959). The work, which now hangs in London's Tate Gallery, was painted in the Thames village of Cookham—in the churchyard. Visitors come from the village over to see the paths and hills that inspired Spencer's paintings. The Spencer Gallery in High Street issues a 6-cent map showing the vantage points where Spencer painted. His subject was Christ in the daily life of Cookham. In the gallery, Christ is seen preaching at a regatta. In the church, Spencer's "Last Supper" shows local brewery. The gallery is open 10:30 A.M. to 1 P.M., 2-6:30 P.M.; 45 cents.

ACCOMMODATIONS—There are many small hotels on narrow village streets where parking is problematical. In the towns there are several dull hotels; characterless, without vistas, withoutousing history or something that they contribute to the daily parade of noisy traffic down streets where a weekly market used to provide the only commotion. There are two places that can take you away from all this. Both are comfortable, not the ultimate in luxury, but right on the river. The Comptons Angler Hotel takes its name from Isaac Walton's famous work on the joys of fishing 350 years ago. He wrote on this stretch of the river at Marlow, 31 miles from London. With private bath, the rooms are around $27-$31 single, $41-$45 double. Phone: Marlow 4444. Sedate sightseeing includes the houses of two poets in Marlow: T. S. Eliot, 2 W. Street, (where he lived with his first wife, 1918-19) and Shelley at 106 West (1817-18). One mile upstream, Bisham village is tranquil with an abbey and a churchtower dating back more than 900 years. The second possibility, on an island in the river at Maidenhead, 26 miles from London. The Duke of Marlborough in 1738 built a fishing lodge and a small pavilion on the island; the pavilion has been enlarged into the 30-room hotel with lunch, dining and weekend dances in the lodge. The bedrooms are like those of a good motel. The surroundings are four acres of lawn and a wooden bridge. Rates, including breakfast, $15.80 single, $23 double (Maidenhead 23400). Overnight stays in homes in the Thames Valley can often be arranged by R & I Tours, 138A Piccadilly, London, W.1. (491-2584). The rates for a couple run from $64 to $108 a night, depending on the lavishness and historic interest of each home. Each additional visitor pays $28 to $50 a night. That covers accommodations, drinks, dinner and breakfast.

RESTAURANTS—Don't be misled by the rolling fields and ancient farmland. Those expecting an abundance of fresh food will be disappointed; behind many an Old World exterior lies an ultramodern deep-freeze in the kitchen. Among the best bets for the gourmet is the Restaurant Elizabeth, 84 St. Aldates, Oxford (tel.: 42230), open for dinner Tuesday through Sunday and for Sunday lunch. Around $14. For riverside views, elegant entrances and expensive cuisine, try the Riverside Inn on Ferry Road, Bray (Maidenhead 20691). Dinner costs around $18; lunches, $11.50. It has a show-biz and expense-account clientele; follow the Rolls-Royces. Closed Mondays. A center of town refuge is Chawley, 55 High Street, Marlow (tel.: 2799), tiny with a short menu; around $11.50, set lunch, $4. Closed Sundays. There's basic good value, if you can ignore the dance band on weekend evenings, at the Monkey Island Hotel, for $16.

INFORMATION—Motoring routes are given in "Thames Valley by Car" (White Horse Books, 40 cents). For boat travelers, Nicholson's Guide to the Thames lists sights, boatyards, hotels, flowers, fish and fowl ($4). Pamphlets, street plans, maps can be had from the English Tourist Board, 4 Grosvenor Gardens, London, S.W.1. (tel.: 730-3400). Local information offices: Windsor Central railway station, daily 10 A.M. to 4 P.M. (52010); Thames and Chiltern Tourist Board, 8 Market Place, Abingdon, Monday to Friday 10-4 (22711); Oxford Tourist Information Center, 109 St. Aldates, Monday to Saturday, 9-5:30 (48707). Stateley homes open to the public are listed in "Historic Homes, Castles and Gardens" (ABC Travel Guides Ltd., $1).

Have a second summer this Summer comes again on Sept. 19 with the start of the Royal Viking Line cruises to the warmest waters in the world.

When summer starts moving south in September, you can follow right along. For as few as 12 days. For as many as 50 days. On one of our eight Second-Summer cruises this fall.

No matter which cruise you select, you will travel in round-the-world elegance every gentle mile of the way, on one of the beautiful white ships of the Royal Viking Fleet. Ships of Norwegian registry. And spirit.

Each is built to world cruise standards. There is an uncrowded vastness to the decks and lounges. A comfortable spaciousness to the limited number of cabins. A deft, nimble gracefulness to the seasoned crews.

You will enjoy comforts not found on ordinary cruise ships. There are no more than 289 cabins, all First Class. 94% of all passengers enjoy sweeping outside views. With fewer people aboard than on most cruise ships, the 300-man crew has ample time to care for everyone.

You can spend your days as actively or as quietly as you like. There are deck games, and quiet, out-of-the-way lounges. There is a swimming pool large enough for swimming, and decks quiet enough for dreaming. There is rousing evening entertainment, and empty moonlit railings. The dining room, set high on the upper deck, is large enough to serve every passenger at a single, relaxed seating.

This is cruising as it was meant to be. Conquer it with us, on a voyage down where the tropics are warm, the nights are languid, and the moon looms so close it seems you can reach out behind it.

Sail off with us to summer. The second one of the year. Perhaps the greatest one in your life. Pick your cruise, then see your travel agent for complete information and reservations. Or call at 212-757-0921, collect.

Next in line is the "Trades of Yesterday" hall, showing a century-old barbershop (25 cents a cut), a toy shop (with a dream of a dollhouse filled with detailed mini-furniture), a photographer's studio and a bank. At the lower level are a bicycle shop, with fine 1890's specimens, and the Roscoe Whitman Machine Shop, which King bought from Whitman's daughters, who for years had kept it in their cellar just as their father left it.

The "Turn-of-the-Century" exhibit (the only part that breaks with the 19th-century motif) is a string of open sheds housing heavy farm equipment, including some early gas engines, the machines that bridged the gap from the horses to modern engines. Everything here was worked in the vicinity during the period from 1890 to 1920: a hay baler, a wood splitter, a log sled, a big cider mill. All the equipment is in good repair, capable of being put to work at a moment's notice.

The village's second homestead, an 1856 country house that was lived in until 1953, is the Dr. Isaac Trafton house. Trafton was Newfield's country doctor late in the century, and he once served in Maine's legislature. Although it is a modest home, it has finer furniture than the Durgin residence across the way. Particularly noteworthy are a great oak breakfast in the dining room and a giant of a rolltop desk in the doctor's office.

Upstairs in the house, reached through a separate entrance, is "The Unmarried Maiden's Room." Actually, there are two small rooms at the top of the stairs: one, with an odd collection of fans and baby carriages, the other with the mysterious maiden's brass bed, her dresses, her flat straw hat, even her chamber pot. Why an unmarried maiden should share her dwelling with baby carriages is not explained. The unmarried maiden herself is not very well explained either; she may or may not have been a relative of the doctor, but was granted lodging for free, much to the dismay of the neighbors.

Donald King says he's spent $2 million on Willowbrook so far, and continues to lose upward of $50,000 a year operating it. The place runs on local talent; he has no imported staff of trained museum workers, no fancy board of directors. The brochure handed to visitors is amateurishly written and produced. Still, Willowbrook works: it is, in the end, one of the most ambitious monuments to the 19th century anywhere—an example of what one indefatigable man can do with an idea and a couple of million dollars.

Notes: New Mexico Indian Center

from the nonprofit East Coast Bicycle Congress, 5300 Akron Street, Philadelphia, Pa. 19124.

INDIAN CENTER

The Indian Pueblo Cultural Center, a tax-exempt, nonprofit enterprise wholly owned by the 19 Pueblo Indian communities of New Mexico, has opened in Albuquerque on an 11-acre tract donated to the Pueblos by the Department of the Interior. The center is designed to "advance the understanding and to insure the perpetuation of Pueblo culture by serving as a prime source of research for scholars, artists and writers." Described as "the smallest Indian reservation in the United States," it features a museum highlighting the Pueblos' past, an arts and crafts market, a living arts program, film and drama presentations and demonstrations of Pueblo craftspeople at work. The center has an Indian restaurant serving such Pueblo specialties as rabbit and mutton stews, red and green chili stews, posole, fry bread, Indian oven bread and, occasionally, venison or buffalo. The location of the center, close to the intersection of Interstate Highways 40 and 25, is convenient to the Pueblo villages that stretch along the Rio Grande. Admission is $1 for adults and 50 cents for children.

ECLIPSE IN AUSTRALIA

Tourists from all over the world will join the thousands of scientists and amateur astronomers who are due to converge on Victoria in southern Australia on Oct. 23 to observe and photograph that rare phenomenon, a total eclipse of the sun—the only one that will occur in 1976. During totality, which will take place in the late afternoon, most of the Australian Continent will be in at least the partial shadow of the moon. The total eclipse will last about three minutes in a 100-mile-wide arc from the border of South Australia up into New South Wales. The moon will start to obscure the sun between 4:35 and 4:40 P.M., and Melbourne, Australia's second largest city (after Sydney), will be in darkness. Qantas, the Australian airline, plans to fly a group of astronomers, "eclipse-chasers," and camera fans from the United States on Oct. 18. They will set up their telescopes and photographic equipment near the runway of the Ballarat Airport, 70 miles northwest of Melbourne.

CRAFTS FAIR

A 12-day International Crafts Exposition with 32 master craftsmen from Europe will be held in The Old Country, Busch Gardens family-entertainment center in Williamsburg, Va., Sept. 11-15, 18-22 and 25-28. The countries the craftsmen come from include Austria, England, France, West Germany, Italy, Scotland, Poland and Czechoslovakia. American crafts will be demonstrated by artisans from the mountains of West Virginia, North Carolina and Missouri and the farm country of Pennsylvania. Among the demonstrations will be wood carving and leather working, stained-glass making, doll and toy making, enamelling, shoe-making, metalworking and needlepoint. The Old Country is five miles east of Colonial Williamsburg, off Interstate 64. Admission, which covers all amusement rides and attractions as well as the crafts demonstrations, is $7.50 for adults and $6.50 for children 4 to 11 (those under 4 free).

AUTUMN FETE

The college community of Clarion, in western Pennsylvania, expects to welcome more than 100,000 visitors to its 23d annual Autumn Leaf Festival from Oct. 10 to 17. Among the week's events will be a beauty contest, crafts demonstrations, an art show, a sidewalk market, an antiques sale and a display of antique and classic automobiles. A gala parade will be held at 12 noon on Saturday, Oct. 16, followed by a Homecoming football game between Edinboro and Clarion State College.

KLONDIKE PARK

The site of America's last great gold rush is being memorialized in the Klondike Gold Rush National Historical Park in Alaska. The park will be composed of three units in the state plus an interpretative center in Seattle, Wash., the city which served as the jumping-off point for thousands of adventurers heading for the Klondike in 1897-98.

Completion of the park is expected in about five years, with 16 historic buildings being acquired in Skagway, a community that grew in a few months from a single trading post to a sprawling city of 10,000 miners awaiting the spring thaw of 1898. The town's wooden boardwalks and weather-beaten buildings still retain a turn-of-the-century flavor, making Skagway a favorite port-of-call with passengers on Inland Passage ferries and cruise ships.

The 13,720-acre park could become part of an international preserve if plans now under way to combine it with the Canadian Klondike come to fruition. The Canadian portion of the Klondike Trail leads from the international border near Skagway down the Yukon River to Dawson and the gold fields.

KENNEDY CENTER

The Bicentennial Parade of American Music is a series of free concerts saluting each of the states. They are held in the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington and will end on Dec. 31 with a tribute to John Philip Sousa by the United States Marine Band. There are 13 concerts remaining between now and then, and no tickets or reservations are required. All performances start at 5:30 P.M. The schedule follows:

- Aug. 31, Montana; Sept. 7, South Dakota; Sept. 14, Washington; Sept. 20, Sept. 27, Wyoming; Oct. 4, Oklahoma; Nov. 4, New Mexico; Nov. 8, Arizona; Nov. 15, Utah; Nov. 17, Alaska; Nov. 18, Hawaii, and on Dec. 31, the grand finale, the Tribute.

THE BIG PICTURE

According to the 21st annual issue of "The Big Picture," a specialized report on the travel industry, international travel is setting records in 1976 as industrial nations recover their two-year recession. This year, world airline traffic is up 3.6 percent over last year, air traffic within the United States has increased 13 percent, and the number of United States passport holders has risen by 1 percent.

Among the points in the report's review of the travel industry, West German travel, which accounted for 46 percent of the world's total international travel expenditure last year, is expected to increase by 10 percent. Another is that the $1 billion earned by Florida out-of-state tourists last year is more than any other state in revenue tourism. In Las Vegas, the report adds, tourists over $2 billion; more than either Britain or Italy from tourism. Increases in tourist traffic were particularly strong in the United States, Britain, Greece and the Philippines.

The report also makes the following points: "A decrease in automobile ownership in Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union has resulted in tight hotel conditions in all of the Communist countries. The number of Eastern European tourists in Western Europe is increasing at about 10 percent a year.

Airfare

TWA also saves you money on airfare alone. With our APEX fare you'll...

Save up to 49%

If you can plan to stay at least 22 and not more than 45 days visiting Europe, TWA can save you money. Up to 49% off the Economy fare.

You must book your round-trip ticket at least two months before departure and pay within seven days of booking. If you travel on Friday, Saturday or Sunday, there is a $15 surcharge. There is a limited number of APEX seats, so the sooner you make your reservations the better.

London or Lisbon

Paris, Casablanca, Madrid or Malaga

$350

Geneva or Zurich

$369

Rome

$433

Athens

$492

NOTE: Because TWA's APEX fare offers substantial savings there are certain cancellation and/or itinerary change penalties. Your prices include round-trip airfare, depend upon when you go and where you stay and are per person, based on double occupancy. Fare and tour prices are subject to change and do not include the $3.00 International Departure Tax or any foreign departure taxes. There are certain restrictions and penalties on these tour packages and fares, so see your Travel Agent for a complete explanation. And pick up your TWA Getaway brochures while you're there.

Being the best isn't everything. It's the only thing.
